Dr. Mohammed Elmasry (left) on the set of the Michael Coren TV Show

The worst part about these comments is that they came from a prominent spokesperson and academic. Israel, sadly, is a country where even the hallowed halls of the academy have not been spared the suffering spawned by indiscriminant terrorism. Of course, according to the logic expressed by Dr. Elmasry on the Michael Coren Show, since the Hebrew University cafeteria that was bombed two years ago was presumed to have been populated by those over 18, this was a fair tactic in the ongoing Middle East war.

Are we surprised at the content of these comments? Well, the organization that Dr. Elmasry heads has one other known spokesperson, its vice-president. Ms. Wahida Valiente, who wrote the following passage in an article commemorating last year's Black History Month:

"Most notably, the Qur'an rejects the Jewish concept of racial superiority; that is, the status of their being a chosen people. The concept is not only racist, but directly contradicts the Qur'anic worldview of racial equality. Unfortunately, the Jewish idea of being 'chosen' not only institutionalized racism, but also set a terrible precedent for human history in general, where racial superiority claims became the norm, the divisive standard by which all others, those not like us were to be judged and treated."

If the Bible and Jewish beliefs are seen to be responsible for setting the historic precedent for racism and other divisive standards, then nothing takes us by surprise – including the vilification of the people of Israel today. What all of this demonstrates is that there are groups in Canada which not only play rough, but who play contrary to the rules of the Canadian game.

On the other hand, we are heartened by the strong voices of condemnation that have been issued against this vicious form of intolerance, from both within and outside the Muslim community. The Elmasry affair has in some ways been a lesson in the bounds of public discourse. Canadians of all stripes have come to view his justification of attacks on civilians as beyond the pale of political disagreement and well into the forbidden realm of endorsing violence against an identifiable group. Let us hope that Canadian values triumph, and that this kind of debased viewpoint has once and for all met its Waterloo.

Toronto supporting Israeli youth at Kfar Galim

By DVORA WILSHANSKY

Visiting Kfar Galim Youth Village just south of Haifa was a special experience for Torontonian Ben Rogowski, who recently participated in UJA Federation's Real Estate Division Mission to Israel. "Forty years ago my father actually attended Kfar Galim. He was born in Haifa. He left Israel in 1973, after the Yom Kippur War and after completing his army service. It's special for me to go back there and see that, through all the difficult times that Israel has been through, we still find a way to keep places like that alive."

"For me to be able to see a place that 40 years ago helped my father, it's amazing," said Rogowski. "We definitely have to keep places like that going, because we can see direct impact of our contributions. And to use a phrase that we hear very often - the children are the future."

Ben Rogowski

Kfar Galim was established in 1953 as an agricultural school. Today it is an educational centre incorporating a junior high school, a high school, and a college for technicians and practical engineers. Of the 900 pupils enrolled, aged 12-20, 45% are olim from Ethiopia, 40% new immigrants from the FSU, and the remaining 15% are sabras. The common denominator unifying the vast majority of pupils is that most come from severely distressed socio-economic backgrounds. Kfar Galim tries to ensure that these kids continue to stay in school until their graduation. In addition to educational and living facilities, various enrichment programs are provided to help ease the challenges of assimilating into Israeli society.

UJA Federation helps support Kfar Galim, which is encountering difficulties due to severely reduced government funding. Recent donations have funded renovations of the bomb shelters and the provision of security guards. Just before Pesach, UJA held a clothing drive to benefit 300 needy pupils. A generous donation of $100,000 was recently raised for the village.

With the support of UJA Federation, Kfar Galim does more than keep the socially challenged youngsters within the education system; graduates finish school with a matriculation (bagrut) degree, complete their army service, and become productive members of Israeli society.

Book of Life

"I believe in Jews helping Jews"

The Book of Life – an initiative of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto – is an archival record containing first-person stories of people who have made an indelible mark on the fabric of Jewish life in Toronto.

By MORRIS ADAMS

I am a child of immigrants. My father, Zelig came from Zhitomir in Russia, (now part of Ukraine) and my mother, Annie from Pzemszyl in Galicia. They met in Toronto and were married in the early 1920s.

My father was a barber, and my mother a hand-sewer in a garment factory on Spadina Avenue. My sisters, Rita and Mimi, and I were born in Toronto in the 1920s and we grew up in the Depression.

I was touched by two Jewish organizations while growing up – once as a boy, and once as a young man -and both had an influence on my future involvement in the Jewish community.

As a boy, I remember my parents' concern about how we could keep warm in the winter. Coal had to be paid for in cash. My mother went to the Toronto Hebrew Free Loan, (now the Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa) to borrow $100 for the winter's supply of coal. Every Sunday morning, my mother gave me $2 to take to 150 Beverley Street to make the weekly payment on the coal loan. It took a year to pay it off - just in time to borrow it again for the next year.

Morris Adams

As a young man, I graduated from Harbord Collegiate in 1944 with honours and I didn't know what to do. We had no money. I turned to Jewish Vocational Services, also at 150 Beverley Street. With their guidance and direction, I became a chartered accountant, graduating in 1949.

Shortly thereafter, my firm appointed me as the partner in charge of a new client - the Toronto Hebrew Free Loan. Was it predestined that I would be able to help an organization that had helped my family so many years ago? There I saw businessmen giving their money, time and energy to help fellow Jews. They taught me how Jews should live.

My first trip to Israel was on a special UJA study mission for young leaders in 1962.

Over the years, I became president of the Toronto Hebrew Free Loan, president of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, and president of Adath Israel Congregation. I served in the United Jewish Welfare Fund, and in many UJA Campaigns. I helped organize the Toronto fundraising for the Alyn children's hospital in Jerusalem. Presently, I am the treasurer of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Canadian Foundation for Masorti Judaism in Israel and Mercaz-Canada.

All this I did with the support of my wife, Ruth, who willingly shared me with our community.

I believe in Jews helping Jews. I have had great satisfaction in being able to help Jewish people in Toronto and in Israel. Helping is both a privilege and an obligation. I hope to continue to help as long as I can, and that my legacy will then continue to help for me.

Prominent Canadians take eye-opening mission to Israel

Non-Jewish participants get insiders look at the Middle East

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Under the leadership of some of Toronto's Jewish community leaders, UJA Federation recently took 23 prominent non-Jewish Torontonians to Israel on an eye-opening, educational leadership mission.

Led by Michael Bregman, Dan Daviau, Jeff Rosenthal and Henry Wolfond, the mission was designed to give participants an in-depth look at the truth behind the headlines in the Middle East.

The five-day mission included meetings with high-level members of Israel's government and military, an eclectic group of speakers, and visits to several important Israeli locations.

For mission participant Rocco Rossi, 42, a partner at NPV Associates, a management consulting firm, and the former mayoral campaign manager for John Tory (now Ontario Conservative leader), his first trip to Israel won't be his last.

"This visit to Israel was definitely the time of my life," said Rossi. "All I really hear and see about Israel from the media is that Israel is a war-zone, but once I got there, I was struck by the vibrancy of the land and its people. There's so much beauty and passion there. People were sitting in cafes, going shopping; even young kids were going to clubs at two in the morning. They have a zest for life and refuse to give that up."

"I quickly saw how ferociously complicated and intricate the situation is in Israel from a military, political, religious, and historical perspective," said mission participant Peter O'Brien, director of development and alumni relations at McGill University's Ontario office, and the group's official scribe and photographer. "If people say that they understand what's been going on in Israel, they obviously haven't been paying attention, because in my mind, it's far more intricate, and layered for any person to fully understand. I went to Israel relatively objective, and as a result of this trip, I have much more sympathy for this small Jewish country that is surrounded by many countries that simply don't want it there."

For John Campion, one of Canada's leading senior legal counsels, the leadership mission put things into perspective.

"The people in Israel are so humane, so courageous as to their own circumstances and in reaching out to others," said Campion. "That combination of humanity and courage is so compelling that little things bring tears to your eyes, and one's own life pales in comparison. It is nothing short of astonishing."

Barbara Amiel asks, "Who are our firm allies?"

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

Journalist Barbara Amiel simply does not understand why President George W. Bush is so unpopular among Jewish Americans. In fact, Amiel, keynote speaker at last week's UJA Federation Women's Campaign & Advocacy Lion of Judah Luncheon, finds his lack of popularity downright troubling.

"He is one of the best allies we have," Amiel told the 200 women in attendance. "He turned Clinton's foreign policy on its head, and has clearly stated he will not negotiate with Arafat."

The views of Europe toward Israel and, in particular, Canada - which "by abstention or by vote against Israel, clearly states its position" - forces us to ask "who are our firm allies?"

"Jews have survived with tremendous tenacity," she said, " but, like any small group, Jews get by with a little help from friends." These friends must be identified, she explained. "In establishing who our real friends are at this time, we are singling out more than 'who are good to the Jews.' It's part of the battle against terrorism – a battle against all that civilization holds dear, such as freedom of speech and individualism," she added.

On the question of antisemitism in Europe and Britain, her birthplace and country of residence, Amiel sees several camouflages being used by those who spout anti-Israel hatred. "Just as anti-Israel sentiment is used to mask antisemitism, so too is the war in Iraq," she explained, referring to the anti-American atmosphere in Europe that is often combined with anti-Israel slogans.

Women's Campaign & Advocacy has already raised approximately $5 million towards Campaign 2005, an action plan for a safe Jewish future, a fact not lost on Amiel.

"You are absolutely amazing," Amiel told the crowd of Lions. "All of you give so much…it's going to make the fight so much easier," she added, referring to the need to defend Israel and Jews everywhere.

Women's Campaign and Advocacy chair Fran Sonshine paid tribute to the women in attendance, thanking them for their individual Campaign gifts of $5, 000 or more. She also praised the 30 endowments that have been established by Lion of Judah members so far.

Campaign 2005, which currently stands at $37.5 million, focuses on the four following pillars:

- Community Security: UJA Federation has initiated a special community task force to review local security needs, especially at schools and community centres. New dollars will fund the implementation of security measures recommended by the task force.
- A Strong Jewish Voice: UJA Federation is supporting the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and other partner organizations that stand up for Israel and against antisemitism.
- Building a Stronger Israel: Campaign 2005 will invest in several programs in Israel with special focus on young people, to help the country recover from years of terror attacks and a weak, but recovering economy.
- Empowering a New Jewish Generation: Campaign 2005 will invest in training programs for young adults to help them counter antisemitism, and initiatives such as birthright israel and March of the Living, to help them connect more closely with Jewish life.

Assembly celebrates day school growth

Excellent Toronto attendance

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA Federation

Close to 30 Toronto education leaders formed one of the largest single-city delegations at a recent Boston conference sponsored by the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE).

It was, in fact, the largest PEJE conference ever, with nearly 700 supporters of Jewish day schools from across North America listening to top experts in the field at a time of unparalleled growth in Jewish day schools. Over 11,000 children attend some 35 day schools in Toronto and another 6,000 go to supplementary schools. Across North America, day schools have attracted more than 200,000 students – a tenfold increase in the past half-century.

"There's no doubt that Jewish education is going through a renaissance period," says Dr. Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation's senior vice president for Jewish education and identity. "There's a growing realization that Jewish education and the future of Jewish life depend on each other."

PEJE founding chair and noted philanthropist Michael Steinhardt challenged delegates to focus their energies on attracting families who have never considered Jewish day schools for their children. Although most Orthodox children receive a day school education, enrolment is lower for other streams of Judaism. "We have to broaden the appeal of day schools beyond the already affiliated," he says. "If we care about the Jewish future, there's nothing more important than education and there's nowhere better to educate our children than in Jewish day schools."

Rabbi Josh Elkin, the executive director of PEJE pointed to the need for a collective community commitment to marketing the value of Jewish education. "The era of each school doing its own thing is over," he says.

The three-day assembly was packed with 80 workshops, presentations and planning sessions, exploring, among other subjects, recruiting and training the best teachers, successful fundraising, encouraging parents of pre-school children to take the next step toward a day school education and retaining students in the day school system.

They also explored several hopeful trends such as the increased involvement of grandparents in programs and funding and the rising number of young parents in Jewish learning programs.

"What really impressed me was the incredible calibre of the people who came out for the assembly," says Rabbi Elkin. "To see these highly talented men and women from every part of the US and Canada so passionate about the power and the future of day schools is not only inspiring, it's a terrific indication of what tomorrow's children will have to look forward to."

Shirley Worth, director, donor development, UJA Federation, shares a moment with Rabbi Josh Elkin, executive director, Partners for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE), during a recent conference in Boston.

Canadian stores stock Nazi dolls

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Stores in Vancouver, B.C., and Mississauga, Ont., have stocked toy soldiers depicting members of an infamous Nazi SS unit that was responsible for running concentration camps in which Jews and political prisoners were murdered.

The toy doll is configured to represent a member of the Nazi Totenkopf (Death's Head) division. It comes with a pistol and a gas mask. The toy's packaging suggests the division fought in Normandy in 1944, although the unit was formed to guard concentration camps.

The doll, part of a series based on the Activision video game Call of Duty, was produced by Plan-B Toys, a company in Groveport, Ohio. Plan-B co-president Chris Borman said the company did not intend to offend anyone, but that the toy merely portrays troops who fought in France.

"We picked them because they've got the coolest gear. It makes a cool figure," Borman told Canadian Press.

"That division was involved in some terrible things, but wasn't everyone during World War II? It's just history," he is quoted as saying.

Bernie Farber, executive director of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, said the manufacturer's attitude is one "we have to confront on a daily basis. It's not just history. The Nazi Totenkopf killed Jews."

Farber said he was concerned that Borman also equated the Nazi unit with Allied soldiers and that the toys' selling point is its "cool uniforms. Survivors recall what people did in these cool uniforms. They killed their mothers and fathers."

An Internet search reveals the unit was involved in war crimes against Allied soldiers. In May 1940, a Totenkopf regiment shot 97 captured British soldiers at a farm in Le Paradis. The unit commander, SS Obersturmfuhrer Firtz Knoechlein, was hanged in 1949 for war crimes.

Bob Butt, director of communications for the Royal Canadian Legion, Dominion Command, said "the Legion does not condone any type of outward display of Nazism. We would think something like that would be ill-chosen and ill-advised, and is insensitive to boot."

Farber said he was told that the Mississauga store has agreed not to replenish its stock of Totenkopf dolls, while a CP report indicated Virgin Megastores in Vancouver has apologized for any harm that may have resulted from its outlets carrying the doll. It also stated its Vancouver store is no longer stocking the item.

After reports of the doll's sale in Canada, Plan B Toys issued a statement on its website saying it "has removed figures from its line of Call of Duty action figures due to numerous requests. Plan B Toys in NO WAY, SHAPE, OR FORM actively promotes ideologies, beliefs or political views that may be associated with the nature of its produet. Our intent was to depict historically accurate action figures of Allied and enemy forces. We apologize for any unintenional harm our product may have caused."

Through its website, Plan-B continues to sell dolls that depict a German Waffen SS MG42 gunner, a Waffen SS NCO and a Panzergrenadier.

Passion for British Jewish event inspires Toronto Limmud

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Peter Sevitt admits to having "a bit of a passion" for Limmud. The Toronto accountant – a native of Birmingham who immigrated in 1972 – is so taken with the annual British Jewish learning festival that he is bringing it here.

Limmud Canada is the first event of its kind to be held in North America. Another will be held in New York in January. Toronto's Limmud will take place Nov. 21 at York University's Founders College.

The British Limmud, which Sevitt noted is a "huge meeting place for young people," has spawned "Limmuds" in Europe, Australia and Israel. Since its inception in 1980, the event, whose name means "learning" in Hebrew, has grown to a five-day retreat at Nottingham University, north of London. The festival attracts 2,300 people over the Christmas holiday.

Sevitt, who is chairing a core committee of at least 20 volunteers, first attended Limmud in 2001 at the suggestion of his daughter, who was living in England and involved in the project. He returned in 2002 and again last year.

"It's something quite extraordinary," he said, referring among other things to the age range of participants (young children to seniors), the dual role of presenters who also become participants, the informality reflected by a lack of titles – "Lord Winston is definitely Robert at Limmud" – and the eclectic variety of topics and denominational backgrounds of speakers.

"Every hour there are 10 speakers," he said. "You can only choose one, and you can't pre-register it. The room may be full, and [if so, you] are going to have to go to your second or third choice. We'll encourage that. That's what Limmud is. There's a huge buzz. There'll be nine other good speakers [to choose from]."

Canada's Justice Minister Irwin Cotler will speak at lunchtime on Jewish values and public policy. Other offerings of the day include "Healthy Jewish Cooking" with cookbook author Bonnie Stern and dietician Fran Berkoff; "Spiritual Parenting" with Rabbi Elyse Goldstein; "Baseball as a Vehicle for American Jewish Culture" with Maxwell Kates; and "Trudeau and Canadian Jews" with history professor Harold Troper. Among the 50 presenters are CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat and CJN reporter Anna Morgan.

All the sessions fall into five categories: arts and culture, text/ideas, contemporary issues, Israel/Ivrit and history.

There will also be sessions for children from ages five to eight, and nine to 12, including Jewish yoga involving body poses based on the aleph-bet.

The program, which received seed money from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, is totally volunteer-run, with 50 high school and university students serving as helpers on the day of the event, said Sevitt.

"I'm hoping it will become an institution, just like in the U.K.," said Sevitt. "It's the most amazing, amazing experience."

Registration, including a kosher lunch, is $60 per adult, and $36 for students and children. There is a $145 family rate for up to two adults and four children.

To register, or for more information, go to www.limmud.ca or call 416-781-8711.

To resolve conflict, we must recognize the 'other': Rae

When bullies are allowed to trump free speech and civil dialogue, it's a very bad sign. And yet the outcry against that decision is also heartening, because it means that there is a deep sense that these are comments and decisions that do not at all reflect the views and feelings of the vast majority.

The idea of a modern, democratic Jewish state in the Middle East grew out of the growing self-awareness of the Jews of 19th-century Europe. Of course, its origins lie much deeper: in the historic presence of the Jewish people in the land of Israel, before their repression and dispersal 2,000 years ago. When the Zionist pioneers came to Ottoman Palestine in the 1880s and 1890s, needless to say, their arrival was not welcomed. Indeed, at every turning point after the Balfour Declaration, at the first suggestion of partition in the late 1930s, again in the 1940s, there's consistently been fierce resistance to the very idea of a Jewish presence, let alone a Jewish state in the Middle East. And yet as we reflect on that resistance, and on its terrible consequences for the world today, it is also important for us to remember that Israel's existence and Canada's commitment to human rights, to pluralism, to the fight against racial hatred, are also foundations of our common belief.

I want to say that Israel is not alone. And the Jewish community is not alone.

The voices of extremism are just that – an angry fringe that gets louder but is not more effective or more resonant for all of its noise… But when it comes to these fundamental questions, I believe very strongly that the vast majority of Canadians come together in the fight against intolerance and in common cause for human rights in Canada and around the world.

The first requirement for the resolution of any conflict… is a fundamental step in human behaviour. And that is the recognition that other people are also legitimate. It's always easier to negotiate in front of a mirror, but when you actually have to confront the "other" and recognize that they, too, have a personality, they, too, have a culture, they, too, have an existence, recognizing that and coming to terms with that is the first step to the resolution of conflict. It's not the denial of conflict – it's the recognition and then its resolution. President [Anwar] Sadat had the courage to do that. Looking back in time, the historic courage that he showed, I think, was truly remarkable. Prime Minister Rabin had the same courage when he recognized the legitimacy of the Palestinian Authority. The tragedy of our time is that both men paid the price with their own lives.

And now we live in a time when we see an escalation of fundamentalist rhetoric that spews out the hatred that the "other" is illegitimate and must be rejected in a horrifying reprise of hatred that echoes the anti-Semitism of the 19th and 20th centuries… It's important that we remind our fellow Canadians that the occupation that is referred to and reviled by Hamas and Al Qaeda is not, as it appears to be to some naive observers, what happened after the war in 1967. It is the very existence of Israel – any Israel – whose legitimacy is denied by the voices of extremism or given such currency in the world today.

The Israel that I know and that I love respects the rule of law, understands the need for pluralism, and seeks to live in peace with its neighbours, within borders that are secure and that are internationally recognized. Yitzak Rabin's courage will have to find its successors in our own time.

No visitor to Israel can be unaware of the debates and the divisions that make it such a democratic and such a vibrant place. I shall always remember asking my Jerusalem cab driver on my first visit to the Knesset, a quarter of a century ago, how many members of the Knesset there were. His simple answer: "About three million." And all the mikes are live. It's quite an extraordinary place to visit, if you haven't been there before.

It is in the context of the conflicting passions that mark the debate in Israeli society, as they must do in any democratic society, that I want to draw attention to the role of reason, facts, evidence, research, in the search for better public policy. That is what great universities are supposed to do. That is what Hebrew University does. It has been a centre of world scholarship since its foundation in 1925. Its beginning was a cause for celebration – its continued success is a cause entirely worthy of our support…

I also accepted this award for another reason, and that is my profound belief that universities matter. They are centres of excellence and innovation. They provide great opportunity in open societies. They also challenge orthodoxy. By insisting on the integrity of intellectual life, they play an irreplaceable role in our society as they do in Israeli society…

In a way, we're celebrating two wonderful countries – our own, because it's given us the means and the ability to support the causes in which we believe, and of course, Israel, to which we owe so much.

YOU CAN'T PUT A BANDAGE ON TERRORISM

But you can help us try to stop the bleeding.

Within seconds, a terrorist strike in Jerusalem can cause devastating losses and massive injuries. Within minutes, victims arrive at the Shaare Zedek Medical Center. Shaare Zedek is overburdened by growing demand for its life-saving emergency care. A new 32,300 square foot Emergency Department, opening this year, will become Jerusalem's premier emergency facility. But equipment costs and other critical needs still outweigh the resources.

You can't put a bandage on terrorism. But you can help us save lives.

Wine critic hosts fundraiser for Israeli sports school

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

In 1992, Jordana Lokash, 20, was killed in a car accident while travelling from Montreal to Dalhousie University in Halifax.

The following year, her family, friends and members of the community established the Jordana Lokash Sports Centre, located in the Frankel School, a public school in the French Hill district of Jerusalem.

The school is open to children of all backgrounds from ages four and up. The centre, however, is operated independently from the school and is associated with the Masorti movement (Conservative) in Israel.

"After Jordana passed away," says Paul Lokash, Jordana's father, "our family wanted to do something in Israel in her memory."

He says that after he was introduced to the principal of the Frankel School and learned that their sports teacher had been killed while serving in Lebanon, "it seemed appropriate to offer the facility a program in gymnastics in Jordana's memory." The centre was established as a gymnastic and recreational facility.

In 2001, Paul Lokash organized a conference on eating disorders with the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, after it was discovered that some of the participants in the gymnastics program at Frankel were suffering from the eating disorders anorexia nervosa and bulimia.

To encompass an expanded mandate, the program, dedicated to the life of Jordana, was renamed the Canada-Israel Institute for Sports and Health Education. Her picture hangs in the centre.

"It is the money raised in Canada that subsidizes the program," says Lokash, a real estate developer.

On Nov. 9, the Canada-Israel Institute for Sports and Health Education holds its first fundraising event, "A Festival of Israeli Wines: Past and Present," chaired by Lokash.

A reception and wine-tasting will be held at the Sandra Ainsley Gallery, 55 Mill St., in Toronto's Distillery Historic District, from 6 to 9 p.m.

Participating in the fundraiser is Jonathan Livny, one of Israel's best- known wine critics. Livny will act as host and guide for a journey of wine-tasting.

Some of the wineries to be represented include Carmel Winery, Handcrafted Wines of Israel, Golan Heights Winery, Recanati Winery, Ella Valley Vineyards and Karmei Yosef Winery.

Lokash says he hopes "to help generate awareness and information relating to the methods of prevention of these potentially deadly diseases [anorexia nervosa and bulimia]."

He adds that "Israel is not immune," noting that according to Dr. Eitan Gur, director of the Eating Disorders Department of the Chaim Sheba Medical Centre at Tel Hashomer, dieting is the national sport in Israel.

According to a recent study, 10 per cent of students suffer from an eating disorder and a significant number of them are boys.

Young people participate in the gymnastics program, operated by the Canada-Israel Institute for Sports and Health Education in Israel's Frankel School.

The institute has designed programs to educate Israeli teenagers, their parents and teachers on how to recognize the early warning signs of these maladies and how to develop healthier lifestyles.

"Along with helping Israeli children," says Lokash, "my goal is to promote Israeli products, in particular, the wineries that are exporting and becoming world class."

Members of the board of directors of the Canada-Israel Institute for Sports and Health Education are Edna Levitt, Ernie Rubenstein and Cory Sherman. Advisory members include Dr. Allan Kaplan, who heads the eating disorders program at Toronto General Hospital and Dr. Naama Constantini of Israel.

Tickets to the wine-tasting are $180. The institute is a registered charity. For tickets, call 416-922-3950 or e-mail Lokash at plokash@on.aibn.com.

Rally for Darfur set for Sunday at Queen's Park

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Canadians for Action in Darfur, a coalition of more than 40 community groups, is planning a rally Nov. 7 from 2 p.m. to 3 p.m. at Queens Park.

The coalition, co-chaired by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and KAIROS, the justice wing of the Canadian Council of Churches, was formed to address the horrors being committed in the Darfur region of Sudan, said Simon Rosenblum, director of public policy and Israel affairs for CJC, and co-chair of the rally's steering committee as a representative of CJC and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Rosenblum said the coalition planned the rally in solidarity with the people of war-torn Darfur, "[who are currently suffering] the greatest human rights crisis in the world. Well over 50,000 people have died, and one million have been displaced. Atrocities include rape as a military strategy."

Other community groups in the coalition include Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish and Humanitarian Relief Committee; the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism; Oxfam Canada; Save the Children; and CASTS (Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan).

"We are calling upon the international community to immediately bolster the mission of the African Union and to widen its mandate to include peace enforcement and protection of civilians," said Rosenblum.

The group also wants the Canadian government "to accelerate its efforts to be a catalyst in energizing the international community to take seriously its responsibility to protect the people of Darfur," he said.

As well, it's "calling on the people of the Greater Toronto Area to come out and publicly demonstrate its concerns."

Rosenblum said Darfur is an issue that world Jewry takes seriously, and he hopes to see a large delegation of Toronto-area Jews at the rally, as well as members of other ethnic communities that have suffered genocide or other large-scale crimes.

"Organizers behind the rally need their members to come out so they can speak with credibility. We need people to bear witness [to the crisis.]" he said.

Ex-Shanghai Jews recall wartime ghetto experiences

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

In the late 1930s and early 1940s, some 20,000 Jewish refugees arrived in Shanghai after escaping from Germany, Austria and Poland.

In Hongkou District, the poorest part of the city, they formed a Jewish community – establishing schools, synagogues, theatres, restaurants, cafes and other institutions and facilities.

Shanghai was the only place fleeing refugees could emigrate without a visa. Most arrived stripped of their belongings and had to rely on Jewish charitable organizations to help them.

Japan, which was at war with China, occupied the city, and barred Jews from leaving the ghetto in the Hongkou district, except by special permit. The Jews lived in squalor and there was much poverty and hunger from 1938 to 1945.

Shanghailanders – as the Jews of the coastal city were known – gathered last month in a downtown Toronto hotel to renew acquaintances and share memories in what was billed as the "Rickshaw Reunion."

The welcoming banner for the Rickshaw Reunion

Seventeen Canadians – including 12 from Toronto – were among more than 250 Jews from Brazil, Argentina, Israel, Australia, Germany, Switzerland and almost every part of the United States who attended the four-day event.

Toronto psychologist Sonja Poizner was the event's chief organizer. Her family had managed to secure their release from a Nazi concentration camp, and later escaped Germany. They found refuge in China in 1939, when Poizner was 10 years old.

Poizner said Shanghailanders –some joined by their children and grandchildren – gather for a reunion every two to three years, "to meet old friends, to celebrate our survival and to relive our years of emigration and detention in a ghetto in Shanghai."

The reunions "give the generations that follow us an opportunity to share with us and carry on the history that is part of their roots," she said.

"I have profound gratitude to Shanghai for the survival of my loved ones."

Participants at the Rickshaw Reunion toured Toronto, attended services at Beth Tzedec Congregation, visited Niagara on the Lake, and toured Ottawa, Montreal and Quebec City.

While in Toronto, they held a banquet, viewed a film titled Shanghai Ghetto and gave presentations about their lives in Shanghai.

Toronto artist Ian Leventhal also spoke to particpipants about his involvement in a renewal project currently taking place in Shanghai.

His involvement began after he visited Shanghai in 2001 and found Hongkou to be one of the most neglected areas of the city.

Upon his return to Toronto, Leventhal teamed up with travel agent Harriet Morton to co-chair a project to send a collection of artworks from the Jewish and Chinese communities in Canada to the "musty halls" of the Ohel Moshe Synagogue in Shanghai, "to commemorate the safe haven Shanghai offered Jews during the war."

The mammoth and highly successful undertaking by 33 artists – titled Gift of Friendship – brought Leventhal back to Shanghai in 2002 for the official opening of the exhibit.

At a celebratory lunch after the opening ceremony, vice-mayor Zhou Mu Yau thanked the Canadians "profusely for our gift and invited us to participate in furthering the revival of Jewish culture in China," Leventhal said.

Leventhal has also formed a company with friend Tom Rado of Toronto called Living Bridge that is working with the Hongkou District government on developing a plan to renovate the old Jewish district. The plan includes a new Jewish museum, a refurbished concert and party venue in an old Art Deco theatre, and an expanded Shan Park, the site of a memorial to the Jewish community.

The final master plan, designed by Cliff Korman of Toronto's Kirkor Architects, has been given preliminary approval, Leventhal said.

Offer to speak off campus rejected by Barak: Lowy

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak turned down a direct invitation from Concordia University to speak in Montreal at an off-campus location, president Frederick Lowy revealed in an op-ed article that appeared in three daily newspapers last week.

Lowy also wrote that the university is studying ways to make it physically possible to have the level of security needed to permit high-level or controversial personalities to speak on campus.

After Hillel and its "supporters" rejected the university's offer to co-sponsor a public lecture by the former Israeli prime minister at an off-campus site, Lowy wrote, Concordia invited Barak to speak "under its auspices."

Concordia spokesperson Chris Mota said the likely site would have been Place des Arts' 3,000-seat Salle Wilfrid-Pelletier, where the university usually holds its convocations, and a couple of dates were offered. She said Barak gave no reason for not accepting.

In late September, the university announced it would not allow Barak to speak on campus, citing the security risk and disruption to the lives of students and staff, as well as the residents and institutions near the Loyola campus. Barak had tentatively been invited by Hillel for Oct. 19.

Security officials, Lowy wrote, feared a repeat of the violent protests in September 2002 against the scheduled appearance of another former Israeli prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu.

Hillel president Jason Portnoy said it was news to him that the university had issued its own invitation to Barak. Portnoy said Hillel has had no direct contact with Barak and has dealt with him only through the agency that books his speaking engagements. He said he has only heard that Barak, now a private citizen, was aware of what happened at Concordia, but was not commenting.

Barak, who is reportedly planning a comeback as Labor Party leader, is surrounded by plenty of security of his own. The Jewish Telegraphic Agency recently reported that the Knesset decided to boost the government's expenditure on Barak's bodyguards from $310,000 to $420,000 (US) a year.

Portnoy found Lowy's suggestion of changes to campus security too vague.

"We want a concrete plan of action with a timeline," Portnoy said. "If there is a legitimate security problem, we have to do something to fix it."

Portnoy also said that when Michael Tarazi, the legal and communications advisor to the PLO, spoke at the downtown Hall building last month at the invitation of Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights, Hillel supported his right to speak on campus.

"We are just asking that this freedom of speech be mutual," Portnoy said.

Lowy's article, his first full statement on the Barak matter, appeared in the Toronto Star, the Gazette and Le Devoir.

Lowy wrote that the university hoped that the offer to Hillel to co-sponsor Barak's speech at an off-campus location would have been "a win-win situation: Freedom of speech would be served because our students and the public at large would still be able to hear Barak's views; security for the university community would be protected because the site selected, approved by the police, would presumably be safer in the event of a large, violent demonstration… Let me stress a Concordia event organized and held off-campus remains a Concordia University event."

Nevertheless, Lowy wrote that Concordia must be able to accommodate high-profile speakers on campus, even those with controversial views on international disputes, but it currently lacks the facilities where such events can be held safely.

"Concordia is now reviewing its physical plant and general environment. Changes recommended by experts will be considered so that all speakers can then be welcomed on campus," he wrote.

"And this will be done in a timely fashion with an eye toward implementing the necessary changes this academic year."

Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, was not impressed by Lowy's explanation, saying in a statement that the university has had ample time in two years to have implemented the necessary security measures.

"The only way that the university can restore its credibility is by re-issuing an invitation to Benjamin Netanyahu to address students in the original 2002 venue [room 110 of the downtown Hall building]. This holds true for Ehud Barak as well, who must be extended an invitation to address an audience right on Concordia's campus. Anything less would be considered a victory by militant groups who clearly continue to set the campus agenda."

Israeli Consul General Marc Attali earlier wrote in a letter of "outrage" to Lowy: "How long must Concordia University be held at the mercy of a small and violent group of students?… I don't feel the need to remind you of the dangers of appeasement, Mr. President – simply that history has taught us a valuable lesson. If we are held captive by fear, we will be forever reluctant to defend our interests and to uphold our values."

Lowy, who is in his 10th and final year as head of Concordia, complained in his article about the negative image Concordia has in the media. Overlooked, he suggested, is its growth and improvements over the past decade, and in particular in the two years since the anti-Netanyahu demonstration. (Lowy notes that many involved in that protest were not students.)

Measures include a new Code of Rights and Responsibilities for everyone on campus, and a formal risk-assessment team to "review requests and monitor situations on campus."

In other news, Concordia has just appointed Combined Jewish Appeal campaign director Kathy Assayag to the new position of vice-president, advancement and alumni affairs, for a five-year term beginning in January.

Her responsibility will be fundraising and she will report directly to the president.

Assayag had been CJA campaign director since 2002, and was director of CJA's Sepharade Division for two years before that.

Few Canadians donating blood as demand grows

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Canadians have good intentions, but when it comes to actually donating blood, very few follow through, according to Gordon Sher, CEO of Canadian Blood Services.

"There is a big disconnect between the intention to donate and the actual act of donation," said Sher.

Thirty per cent of people surveyed said that they intended to donate within the next year, but "intentions are not being translated into action," he added. In fact, only 3.7 per cent of eligible people in Canada donate blood.

Speaking at the 24th annual general meeting of Jewish Family Services (JFS) of Ottawa, Sher said that fewer Canadians give blood than people in the United Kingdom, United States and parts of Europe, but the Canadian donors who do give, give more frequently than their counterparts in other places.

"The demand for blood and blood products continues to go up. At the same time, regulatory hurdles and safety measures make donation more stringent," he said. "Canadians are much more confident in the safety and security of the blood supply in Canada than they were five years ago." The time required to screen potential donors and the strict guidelines for who is an acceptable donor, however, result in approximately 20 per cent of prospective donors being rejected.

Reasons given most commonly for people not donating blood are lack of time and inconvenient locations. Canadian Blood Services is trying to accommodate donors by having clinics in convenient locations and extending clinic hours to evenings and weekends. There is also an attempt to draw in young donors, beginning at 17 and 18. "If you can get someone to donate three times," said Sher, "you have them."

Innovative advertising, corporate partnerships and an interfaith pilot project launched in 2003 are all geared toward attracting new blood donors. It is hoped that the interfaith project, which began in Ottawa with the aim of making blood donation an integral part of the city's spiritual life, will soon become a national program.

At the JFS annual general meeting, the Elaine Rabin Social Service Award, given each year in honour of the founder of JFS of Ottawa, was presented to Lynda Klingen and Central Park Lodges. Klingen, the executive director of Central Park Lodges, has initiated monthly kosher Friday night dinners for the residents, as well as community Passover seders and a Rosh Hashanah dinner. She has also made available a bus to transport Jewish seniors to Jewish community programs.

The staff and volunteers of JFS were recognized for their dedication and hard work and a presentation was made by Executive Director Mark Zarecki to Jonathan Wouk, who retired after many years as the agency's chaplain.

"Jonathan is able to reach people who, in many cases, are unreachable," said Zarecki. "In many of the institutions we go to, people are isolated 24/7… many of these people are in the twilight of their lives. His work shows that every individual is important in the community, and Jonathan has helped us as an agency [to] realize that."

Rabbi Arnold Fine, recently retired from Congregation Agudath Israel, is now the JFS chaplain.

Australian high schooler wins debating meet

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Ryan Steed, a Jewish high school student from Australia, has won the Gray Academy of Jewish Education's first annual Asper Cup debating competition.

He was chosen as the best individual debater from a group of 48 students who took part in the Oct. 13-14 event.

The students represented 14 high schools, both public and private, and while most are located in Winnipeg or Manitoba, there were also students from Herzliah High School in Montreal; Strathcona-Tweedsmuir School in Okotoks, Alta.; Carmel School, a private Jewish school in Perth, Australia (which Steed attends); and a contingent of students from the Israeli Debating Society.

The idea for the Asper Cup competition – and the four-year-old debating program at Gray Academy, Winnipeg's only pre-school to Grade 12 Jewish day school – came from Winnipeg businessman Raymond Kives. His son Michael developed into a world-champion debater at St. John's Ravenscourt, Winnipeg's most prestigious private school, which has had a debating program for many years. (Michael graduated from Stanford University last spring. He was back in Winnipeg in September to participate in a public debate.)

"Raymond Kives felt that all students should have the opportunity that Michael had to learn debating," said Linda Martin, the founder of Gray Academy's debating program and co-ordinator of the Asper Cup.

"He saw that such a program helps students to communicate with family, friends, employers and peers. It provides them with the skills to articulate well in job interviews and to gain employment, to persuade others of their point of view and thus to be successful in their goals and careers. Students who participate in debating become self-confident and potential leaders."

Martin said debating is now a regular course for Grade 7 and 8 students at Gray Academy, and a credit course option for students in higher grades.

Last year, Gray Academy students represented Manitoba at the Senior National Debate Championship in Calgary, the Junior Championship in Edmonton, and placed second and third in team competitions at the Provincial Novice Championship. Coming up this year is the International Independent Schools Public Speaking Competition in St. Catharines, Ont., a qualifying tournament for the World Individual Speech and Debate Championship in Cyprus.

"The goals of the Asper Cup are to provide a forum for excellent debate, to join students from around the world, and to provide a debate forum, not held on Shabbat, where Jewish students can become involved," Martin said.

The first phase of the Asper Cup debates were held at Gray Academy. On the evening of Oct. 14, the top four teams faced off at Shaarey Zedek Synagogue for the team championship in an event that was open to the public.

In the first round, twin brothers Rosh and Roshan Sethi from Strathcona-Tweedsmuir in Alberta faced off against Gray Academy's Susan Schipper and Elana Shapira over the question of whether or not national borders should be re-evaluated.

The second debate pitted Steed and schoolmate Craig Hershkowitz against Matt Literovich and Julian Prokopetz from St. John's Ravenscourt. Their topic was whether security or liberty was more important.

The overall team winner was St. John's Ravenscourt, with Carmel from Australia placing second and Gray Academy third. The Israeli team finished seventh.

Anti-Semitic hate mail shocks McMaster

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The hate crimes unit of Hamilton Police Service is investigating an anonymous e-mail received by executive members of the McMaster University student group Zionists@McMaster Oct. 24.

It bore a terse, unsigned message, addressed to "My fellow penny pinching jews," and referring to a picture the author had uploaded onto the group's Yahoo website.

Avi Ben-Zvi, president of Zionists@McMaster, later found an illustration of a helmeted soldier pointing his right forefinger – captioned "Always Remember… Jesus and Hitler told the Truth about the Jews" – on the group's website, which is available to its 160 members, and on which visitors have been able to post messages.

Ben-Zvi told The CJN last Friday that a report was filed with McMaster University Security Services, who then contacted police.

"It was shocking," said Ben-Zvi. "To be singled out as Jews for Israel activism is very upsetting."

Among the group's executives, he noted, are two Christian Zionists. "Many of our members are not Jews."

Ben-Zvi said he has no idea who might have sent the e-mail, and was particularly upset that younger, first-year representatives "who have the courage to stand up for Israel on campus" were also targeted. He fears some members will be intimidated. "But for a lot of us, it reminded us we need to strengthen our resolve. We really do have a purpose on campus. I think that our open activism will only work to combat this form of hatred."

Last year, Ben-Zvi received an anti-Semitic e-mail that was signed, and he later met with the student who sent it. They left on better terms, he said, adding that the student nonetheless continued to visit the Zionist group's tables and make "controversial remarks."

Ben-Zvi said many students at McMaster fear harassment by other students if they wear Jewish symbols, but Bill Armstrong, operations manager for McMaster University Security Services, said hate-related incidents are "pretty rare" among the 3,000 occurrences they deal with each year. "I'm not saying it doesn't exist, but it hasn't been brought to my attention. This one jumped right out at us."

Ken Norrie, McMaster's provost and vice-president (academic), said he was appalled by the incident. "If anything smacks of hate mail, we have zero tolerance for it. We will not put up with it."

The university is in favour of open discussion, including on controversial topics, "but it has to be done in an atmosphere of mutual respect," he said. "We will be doing whatever we can to find out who sent it, and to stop it… It is not part of McMaster's culture or tradition to have this. We pride ourselves on an open community." Umair Khan, vice-president (finance) of the McMaster Students Union, under whose jurisdiction student clubs fall, also expressed shock, as well as support. " We're hoping we can work with the police, the university and Zionists@McMaster to help resolve the issue."

Brandon deSilva, McMaster's Jewish Student Association president and a member of Zionists@McMaster, said he was "horrified, dismayed and angry. "We're supposed to be on a diverse campus in Canada. It's horrible that we're still getting this kind of hatred coming up in our day-to-day lives."

The JSA, with about 250 members, is a separate entity from the Zionists@McMaster, but it co-sponsors non-political pro-Israel activities, said deSilva. "We keep the political stuff separate."

Jews, Israel and America lumped under media microscrope

Israel is always under intense media scrutiny. But recent coverage has been even heavier than usual, due to momentous events such as the Knesset vote in favour of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Gaza disengagement plan and, at the time of writing, breaking news that Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat might be critically ill.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Canadian media generally reported on the Knesset vote in a straightforward manner. On the Oct. 26 television newscasts, reports by Adrienne Arsenault for CBC's The National, Martin Himel for Global and Janis MacKey Frayer for CTV all emphasized that Sharon's plan was daring – if controversial – especially because he had been a prime architect of the settler movement.

Himel explained: "Sharon defended the [Gaza withdrawal] with demographics. He said Israel must unilaterally disengage from ruling 1.5 million Palestinians. Otherwise… the Jewish state could lose its democratic identity."

> The Canadian media generally reported on the Knesset vote in a straightforward manner

The National Post's front page story the next day ("Israel votes to quit Gaza," Oct. 27) was an in-depth report by Matthew Fisher, CanWest's new Middle East bureau chief, based in Jerusalem.

The Globe and Mail gave the story less attention, reprinting a Boston Globe piece ("Knesset backs Gaza pullout plan," by Charles A. Radin, Oct. 27). But its Oct. 27 lead editorial, "The Knesset wisely backs Sharon on Gaza," said the decision "is a wrenching but necessary step for which Mr. Sharon and Israel deserve applause and international support."

Elsewhere in the Globe and Mail, in two recent columns ("A shift in policy on Mideast?" Oct. 15; "Is Canada preparing to shift line in the sand?" Oct. 21), John Ibbitson implied that the federal government is moving from a traditional, balanced Mideast approach to a "pro-Israel" stance.

Ibbitson did not back up his argument with any substantive evidence. Nor did he explain what Canada's Middle East policy currently is, or how it is in the process of being reviewed. Responsible journalism requires more than mere speculation and innuendo.

The New York Times was also critical of what it believed to be the pro-Israel tilt in American foreign policy. The Oct. 18 Times editorial, "The Middle East Awaits," criticized both U.S. President George W. Bush and rival presidential candidate Senator John Kerry for "offering… Sharon virtually uncritical support for whatever military operations or settlement expansions he chooses to undertake."

The close relationship between the Bush administration and the Sharon government was also blamed for the escalating violence in Iraq in a recent Times column by Thomas Friedman ("Jews, Israel and America," Oct. 24).

Part of the problem, Friedman wrote, is "a steadily rising perception across the Arab-Muslim world that the great enemy of Islam is JIA – 'Jews, Israel and America,' all lumped together in a single threat… This trend has been helped by the Bush team's failed approach to the Arab-Israel problem, which is to tell the truth only to Yasser Arafat, while embracing Ariel Sharon so tightly that it's impossible to know anymore where U.S. policy stops and Mr. Sharon's begins."

Friedman mysteriously forgets that previous U.S. administrations tried to work with Arafat, who proved beyond any reasonable doubt that not only can he not be trusted as a reliable negotiating partner, but, more importantly, that he has no intention of putting an end to the Palestinians' conflict with Israel. Friedman also fails to mention that Bush is the first U.S. president to officially call for the creation of an independent Palestinian state – one that depends on a new Palestinian leadership actually committed to ending violence and terrorism as demanded in the internationally backed "road map" peace plan.

Still, some media pundits' complaints about "unbalanced" foreign policy in Canada and the U.S. are relatively minor irritants compared to the massive and violent propaganda campaigns waged against Israel by its enemies.

As Norman Spector wrote in his Daily Press Review (Macleans.ca, Oct. 27) about the recent remarks by Canadian Islamic Congress head Mohammed Elmasry that all Israelis over 18 are legitimate Palestinian targets: "What I can't figure out is the hullabaloo over Mohammed Elmasry; is anyone truly surprised by his statements? And, if the hapless professor heeds the editorialists' call to resign, how likely is it that the next guy to head the Canadian Islamic Congress will think any differently about the legitimacy of 'martyrdom' attacks against civilians in the Mideast?" (Spector's daily analysis can be found at http://weblogs.macleans.ca/dailypress review/.)

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Former Niagara Falls rabbi also served in Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Obituary

For 23 years until 1998, Rabbi Nathan Liberman served the Niagara Falls Jewish community as rabbi, cantor, teacher and principal of the Hebrew school at B'nai Jacob Congregation.

He is also remembered as cantor of Toronto's Beth Am Congregation (now part of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation), where he served for 16 years before moving to Niagara Falls. Rabbi Liberman died Oct. 22 in St. Catharines' Hotel Dieu Hospital following a lengthy illness. He was 84.

"He was such a wonderful man," recalled Susan Jackson of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, who knew him professionally when she worked with small communities for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. "He was soft-spoken. The kids adored him. He had such a kind way about him… but he had a serious backbone and wouldn't compromise his Jewish values for anything."

> 'He had a kind way....but serious backbone'

Rabbi Liberman, a native of Warsaw, was the descendant of a long line of rabbis. When World War II broke out in 1939, he was studying at a yeshiva in Riga. It wasn't until after the war, in Italy, that he received his smichah.

Although the rabbi lost two brothers and his father during the war (his mother died in the early 1930s, and one sister survived), he never showed any bitterness, Jackson told The CJN.

In a eulogy at his funeral in St. Catharines, Rabbi Liberman's daughter Rosalie Samosh, who taught alongside him for many years, remembered her father as a "very peaceful and mild-mannered man who had a great love of music, the Hebrew language and the Land of Israel."

She said she finds it impossible to imagine him as a soldier in the Russian army, referring to a wartime stint after he escaped from Poland.

An experience the rabbi had in the army, when he lost his ration card and a fellow soldier shared food with him, had a lifelong influence, Samosh said. "He vowed to dedicate his life to emulating this man's kindness and helping others in their time of need."

The rabbi's door was open to anyone, Jewish or not, who needed support, including congregants, fellow clergy and strangers, she added.

Samosh's sister Sharona noted that their father did a lot of interfaith work in Niagara Falls, which then had a Jewish population of about 65 families (it has about half that number now). He used to go into high schools to talk about Judaism, and bring students and church groups into the synagogue, she said.

After he arrived in Canada in 1949, joining relatives in Montreal, Rabbi Liberman studied at the United Jewish Teachers Seminary there. He subsequently worked with the Jewish community in the Niagara area. In 1957, he travelled to Israel, where he met his wife, Esther.

Following Rabbi Liberman's retirement, B'nai Jacob, a Conservative synagogue, amalgamated with St. Catharines' Reform congregation. The congregation, still based in Niagara Falls, is now called B'nai Tikvah.

Rabbi Liberman "wanted to make a difference," Jackson said. "He felt these smaller communities really needed a rabbinical leader… There are actually generations of Jews out there who attribute their Jewish identity to him."

Rabbi Liberman is survived by Esther, his wife of 47 years; daughters Rosalie Samosh of St. Catharines, Sharona of Toronto and Rachelle Frydman of London; eight grandchildren, and his sister Chana Celniker of Toronto.

Culinary tour of Israel about more than food

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

An upcoming culinary tour of Israel led by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein and cooking maven Bonnie Stern, is about much more than food.

"It's about Jewish culture, and it's about the ethnic diversity of Israel," says Rabbi Goldstein, director of Kolel, the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

The nine-day tour, taking place Feb. 13 to 21, is organized by Skylink Holidays. It includes visits to the major sites, says Rabbi Goldstein, "but the added hook is the culinary part of the tour.

"Over the course of only 56 years of existence, more than three million Jews from all over the world have gathered in Israel. This culinary extravaganza will be a splendid celebration of the diversity of universal Jewish life in Israel," she says.

Some of the highlights of the tour are a visit with food writer and cookbook author Phyllis Glazer, who will talk about Israeli cuisine and give a challah demonstration; a trip to the Druze-Muslim-Jewish village Peki'in, where the tour group will see a traditional style olive press and sample olive oil from the ancient trees in the area; breakfast at a goat cheese farm; and a visit to the spice shops and stalls in the Old Acco market.

On the Friday afternoon of the tour, participants will be divided into two or three groups and will visit the homes of Moroccan-born and first-generation families from the Atlas Mountain area who will demonstrate a different aspect of a Moroccan meal. Groups will come together to enjoy the meal.

At Carmei Ha'ir, which operates as a restaurant in the evening and a soup kitchen during the day, owner Moshe Basson will serve native Jerusalemite foods.

The group will also visit an Arab culinary school that trains disadvantaged Arab youth.

The tour is open to anyone who has an interest in food, says Stern. "The whole point is that it is not for professional chefs. It is for people who love to eat and who want to see Israel in a whole new light."

She visited Israel with Kolel for the first time last year, and "got captivated. We ate at Carmei Ha'ir and I [am anxious to share my experience.]"

People in Israel are anxious to "nourish visitors with knowledge and with background. Both teaching and cooking [are seen] as nourishment, and people want to share," Rabbi Goldstein says.

An information meeting about the tour will take place Nov. 7, 7 p.m. at the Bonnie Stern School of Cooking, 6 Erskine Ave., or call Skylink Holidays at 416-923-2003.

Stern offers these recipes from Moshe Basson.

Tour set for February

1 cup red lentils
2 tbsp. oil
1 large onion, chopped
3 cloves garlic, finely chopped
1 jalapeno chile, seeds and ribs removed, sliced
1/2 tsp. ground cumin
8 cups water
2 tsp. lemon juice
2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
1/3 cup fresh coriander, chopped

Rinse lentils a few times. Spread out on a baking sheet and discard any stones. Heat oil in a large saucepan. Add onions, garlic and jalapeno, and cook gently until tender and fragrant. Add cumin and cook until fragrant, about 30 seconds.

Add lentils and water. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer gently 30 to 45 minutes or until lentils are very tender. Stir in lemon juice, salt, pepper and coriander. Adjust seasoning if necessary. Makes eight to 10 servings.

MOSHE BASSON'S FIGS STUFFED WITH AROMATIC CHICKEN

These figs are Basson's signature dish. We had them as an appetizer along with stuffed chard leaves and four kinds of salad. Tamarind paste is available at many health food stores and at Asian and East Indian markets.

2 tbsp. olive oil
1 onion, chopped
8 oz. boneless, skinless chicken breasts, finely chopped or ground
1 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1/4 tsp. each of allspice and cardamom
18 dried figs

Sauce
1 tbsp. tamarind paste
2 cups boiling water
2 tbsp. brown sugar
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. each of cinnamon, allspice and cardamom

Heat oil in large deep skillet and cook onions until tender and lightly browned. Add chicken, salt, cinnamon, allspice and cardamom. Cook a few minutes, until chicken is just cooked through. Remove chicken from pan and cool.

Return pan to heat. Prepare sauce by removing any seeds from tamarind and add tamarind to pan with water, sugar and salt, and spices. Bring to a boil. Cook a few minutes.

Cut a slit on the side of each fig and open up the cavity with your finger. Stuff with chicken mixture.

Place figs in sauce. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat, cover and simmer gently 15 to 20 minutes, stirring occasionally.

Remove figs to a platter. If sauce has reduced too much (you should have about 1/2 cup), add a little water. Strain sauce over figs. Makes 18 figs.

PEARS POACHED IN POMEGRANATE JUICE

Along with barley, wheat, grapes, olives, dates and figs, pomegranates are one of the seven foods specifically mentioned in the Bible as growing in the land of Israel. If you can't find pomegranate juice, you can dilute pomegranate molasses or use cranberry juice instead.

6 firm but ripe pears
1 cup pomegranate juice
1 cup dry red wine
1 cup water
1/2 cup sugar
1 cinnamon stick
2 tbsp. pomegranate seeds or dried cranberries

Peel pears. Cut in half and remove core and seeds. (A melon baller works well for this.)

In a wide saucepan bring pomegranate juice, wine and water to a boil. Stir in sugar and cinnamon stick. Add pears and cook gently for 20 to 30 minutes, until tender. Remove pears.

Return pan to heat and cook on medium/high until liquid is reduced to about 1 cup.

To serve, leave stem end attached and slice pears so that they can be fanned out. Serve two halves per person. Spoon juices on top and sprinkle with pomegranate seeds or dried cranberries. Makes 6 to 12 servings.

Progressive campus Zionists meet

By NAOMI LIGHTMAN
Special to The CJN

There is an urgent need to redefine Zionism on university and college campuses: that's the message I walked away with from last month's inaugural conference of the Union of Progressive Zionists (UPZ), a new campus movement for left-wing students.

Speaking for myself, I've had enough of simultaneously defending Israel's right to exist to left-wingers at McGill University, where I'm a student, while at the same time criticizing the blind patriotism espoused by many members of Hillel and groups on the right.

North American campuses are extremely polarized when it comes to the Middle East, but many Jewish students want to be both pro-Israel and pro-Palestine and not be excluded from the mainstream. As far as I can tell, this is where the UPZ intends to fit in.

More than 100 participants from some 40 universities and colleges across North America attended the UPZ conference in Newark, N.J., on Oct. 15-17. We were there to both show our support for Israel and to defend our right to criticize the policies of its government. Meretz USA, the Labour Zionist Alliance, Habonim Dror, and Hashomer Hatzair – the UPZ's founding organizations – were the conference's main sponsors.

Over the course of the weekend, we heard from a range of Israeli, Palestinian and Israeli Arab speakers. They discussed their views about the way forward toward peace and justice between Israel and the Palestinians. Most memorable were Amjad Atallah, a PLO advisor and peace activist who inspired us with his endorsement of the proposed Geneva Accord peace deal, and keynote speaker Naomi Chazan, a former Meretz MK.

Chazan spoke enthusiastically about the concept of the UPZ, declaring, to overwhelming cheers from the audience, that, "A two-state solution is the only way we can fulfill the Zionist dream!"

Workshops focused on topics such as "Socialist-Zionism, past and present"; "Confronting divestment"; "Transcending violence in the pursuit of peace"; and "Campus Activism 101". Although there was some criticism about the lack of discussion time, the participants in all of the sessions I attended were engaged and dynamic.

Daniel Roth, 23, was one of 10 Canadian participants. He attends the University of Toronto and is the director of Hashomer Hatzair-Kidma on Campus.

Roth came to the conference to network with like-minded young people and said he was impressed with the balanced approach of the speakers.

"It was a positive feeling at this conference that we weren't just a group of Jews saying 'Yeah, we know how to communicate with the other side.' We actually were communicating with the other side," he said.

Roth believes Zionism must evolve to reflect today's realities and that the only way to ensure Israel's safety is through the creation of a Palestinian state.

"There's racism in Israel now, there's an occupation of displaced peoples, and there are problems with Israel's economy. For me, Zionism is working towards the complete betterment of the state," he said.

Tomer Chervinsky, 21, another participant and president of the Waterloo-Israel Public Affairs Club, said that in addition to being criticized by Hillel, he has felt very alienated from the so-called "progressives" at the University of Waterloo.

"There's a lot of apathy and misunderstanding coming from the left at school," Chervinsky said. "A hardcore, nationalist Palestinian group is a right-wing thing. Being left-wing is about building coalitions and working together for peace."

Overall, I think that the opinions and backgrounds of the participants was one of the conference's strengths. There can be no one model for UPZ campus organizations.

Those of us who attended the conference will be working on our respective campuses to seek out the many Jewish students who feel pressured to assume a particular political stance on the Middle East.

Undoubtedly, it is a confusing, emotional time for us as Jews. But the hope is that a progressive, redefined idea of Zionism can work to everyone's betterment.

Arafat illness gives Israel hope

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Yasser Arafat's illness has done what Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, for all of his attempts, could not: create a sense of hope in the possibilities of a future without the grizzled Palestinian Authority president.

There was an unusual hush when the matter of Arafat was raised at Sunday's meeting of the Israeli cabinet.

Previously, ministers of all political stripes had railed against Sharon, belying Jerusalem's official line that Arafat was "irrelevant" to peacemaking.

This time, with Arafat undergoing urgent and secretive tests at a French hospital, a sense of genuine hope dawned.

Israel plans to press ahead with its unilateral withdrawals from the Gaza Strip and West Bank despite Arafat's illness, Sharon told his cabinet on Sunday, but he left open the possibility for further peace talks should new Palestinian leaders take over.

"If a leadership arises that acts to dismantle the terror infrastructure, we will be prepared to resume negotiations on the basis of the 'road map,'" Sharon told his ministers, referring to the U.S.-backed peace plan, rendered all-but defunct by persistent violence.

The chief of Israeli military intelligence, which had made clear in media leaks that it knew well in advance of Arafat's airlift to Paris last Friday that his condition was grave, sounded even more optimistic.

"I think we have an opportunity here to end the current round of conflict that began in 2000," Maj. Gen. Aharon Ze'evi-Farkash told the cabinet in a briefing.

But Ze'evi-Farkash agreed with Sharon's assessment that the Palestinians must be left to their own devices in choosing a potential successor for Arafat. Any Israeli overtures toward this-or-that candidate would risk marking him as a stooge in the eyes of his countrymen – a death sentence politically, and perhaps even literally.

Arafat was reported to be in critical condition late last week, but by Sunday his condition apparently had improved, according to Leila Shahid, the Palestinian Authority's general delegate to France. Arafat does not have leukemia, she said, speaking to reporters Saturday outside the hospital near Paris where the 75-year-old Palestinian leader is undergoing medical tests.

Meanwhile, Israeli military chiefs boosted forces around the West Bank city of Ramallah, where Arafat had been confined to his compound before leaving for Paris.

According to security sources, army commanders were instructed to review a plan of action, written up last year, in anticipation of Arafat's death.

Israel fears Arafat, who always refused to groom a successor, will leave a power vacuum in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, triggering Palestinian factional fighting.

Given the confusion over the degree to which Arafat was incapacitated, his colleagues in Ramallah were playing it safe.

On Sunday, they held the first-ever PLO meeting without him. Arafat's empty chair was flanked by the current and former prime ministers of the Palestinian Authority, Ahmed Qureia and Mahmoud Abbas, who for now have divided Arafat's responsibilities between them.

Sharon had long said that were Arafat to leave the West Bank he would not be allowed to return, but last week the prime minister reversed this position in letting the Palestinian leader be flown out for treatment.

"We have made this commitment and we shall stick with it," Sharon told a cabinet minister who suggested that Arafat be made to stay abroad.

Yasser Arafat prepares to leave Ramallah to be treated in France.

Arafat rejects power transfer

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper

Analysis

The blood transfusion that Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat received after leaving the Muqata with his doctors made him feel better and his condition improved. This does not mean a significant bettering of his health – it may be only a temporary upswing, but it could last a long time. That's the information that has been presented to Israeli decision-makers.

This fact is weighty, given Arafat's refusal to accede to the requests of former PA prime minister Mahmoud Abbas and current premier Ahmed Qureia to fill in names, give out jobs or to delegate to them his powers as PA president and head of the PLO. Abbas and Qureia visited Arafat at his sickbed and asked that he transfer authority temporarily, with an appropriate division of responsibilities between them.

A completely alert Arafat understood their demands, but responded that there was no need for such a significant change. When the two repeated their demands in other ways, he asked that the conversation come to an end, a roundabout way of asking them to leave the room. This means that Arafat left for France with all his powers intact.

The decision by Abbas and Qureia to convene the various PLO and PA institutions is important from a symbolic point of view, but it has no practical significance as long as Arafat's principal powers have not been transferred to them – or if they don't take them in a putsch, which seems unlikely.

After the various institutions convene, can Qureia claim that the preventive security organization in the West Bank and Gaza, for example, is subject to him, and will its members obey his orders? Will Fatah's Al Aqsa Brigades now obey Abbas? The answer is no in both cases. The organizations are still subject to Arafat, who is in the hospital in Paris, and not to Qureia or Abbas.

Politically, this means that because of Arafat's health, Israel and the Palestinians may be entering a long and nebulous intermediate period during which the two sides will have difficulty making important decisions. As time goes on, Hamas or its partner, Islamic Jihad, may be the ones to disrupt the status quo.

ANNOUNCING
THE BRONFMAN YOUTH FELLOWSHIPS IN ISRAEL 2005

For the nineteenth consecutive summer, a group of outstanding Jewish teenagers from the U.S. and Canada, coming from a wide variety of backgrounds and entering the twelfth grade of school, will be recipients of the Bronfman Youth Fellowships.* They will spend five fulfilling weeks of study, dialogue and travel in Israel.

The Bronfman Fellows will be selected on the basis of character, intellectual interests, special talents and leadership qualities. Merit, not financial need, is the program's selection standard. Fellowship activities begin June 27th, with a return from Israel August 3rd. All meals will be kosher, and Sabbath activities will be in keeping with the sanctity of the day.

While in Israel, the Fellows will engage in an intense interaction with a diverse faculty of master educators, representing a wide range of Jewish perspectives. They will explore Jewish texts against the background of Israel's land, culture and customs, meet with Amitei Bronfman, our parallel Israeli fellowship and take part, at a time of rapid change, in seminars with some of the country's leading political and cultural figures. Simultaneously, they will debate a constant flow of ideas and search for insights on the various ways to define oneself as a Jew today - all in an atmosphere of mutual respect and open dialogue.

Upon returning home, the Fellows participate in a series of seminars, a weekend with the Israeli Fellows, and a wide range of alumni activities, programs and projects, all aimed at promoting our goals of commitment, pluralism, study and dialogue. For many Fellows, the summer in Israel is just the beginning of a lifelong association with fellow "Bronfmanim."

* Fellowships cover roundtrip transportation between New York and Israel, educational programming, room and board and travel in Israel.

Completed applications must be submitted or postmarked by January 5, 2005

In Israel, tension in the air over withdrawal vote

By DINA KRAFT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — "What's more important – a religious Jew adhering to Torah or a secular Jew adhering to his or her conscience?" asked a teenage girl with a red ponytail.

Her question, addressed to leaders of Peace Now and the Council of Jewish Communities in Judea and Samaria (the Yesha settlers council), went straight to the heart of the Israeli dilemma, as citizens here struggle to define Israel's future as both a Jewish state and a democracy.

"Sometimes a question is better than an answer," said Daniel Tropper, founder of the Gesher Foundation, whose goal is to bridge the gaps between different segments of Israel's population.

The question came last Wednesday, the day after the withdrawal vote in the Knesset, at a day of dialogue hosted by Gesher at a Jerusalem square, bringing together religious and secular, right-wing and left-wing Israelis in an effort to find common ground at a time of discord.

The mood in Israel is raw and charged as Israelis observe the ninth anniversary of former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassination and absorb the Knesset vote backing Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's controversial plan to withdraw from the Gaza Strip.

Threats from extreme right-wing Jews are intensifying against Sharon, who travels under increased security.

Vandals this week sprayed graffiti on a Jerusalem wall reading, "We assassinated Rabin, and we'll assassinate Sharon too."

"Nine years have passed and it is as if we have learned nothing," Geula Even, an Israeli television news anchor, said in reporting the incident.

The Conservative movement introduced a new prayer for Sharon's health and well-being in the wake of what movement leaders said were calls from some haredi rabbis to institute "death rituals" to bring about Sharon's demise.

The Gaza withdrawal plan has led to increased tension. Jewish settlers claim it is their biblical birthright to live in Gaza, saying any attempt to evacuate Jews from their homes and leave the area to the Palestinians is against God's will.

Several thousand Gaza settlers flooded Jerusalem for a mass protest before Tuesday's withdrawal vote. Schools in the Gush Katif settlement bloc were closed and busloads of schoolchildren, along with their parents, came to the capital, waving signs and chanting anti-government slogans.

The evening before the vote, thousands of left-wing demonstrators marched on the Knesset in a show of support for Sharon and the disengagement plan, arguing that the majority of the public favours withdrawal.

At the settlers' protest, Yaffa Goldschmidt, deputy principal of an elementary school in Gush Katif, was defiant. She said the community is united in its struggle against the plan, and she defended bringing children to the protest.

"Of course we brought the students here today. The government is trying to kick them out of their homes," she told Army Radio.

In a statement signed by 60 other rabbis, Rabbi Avraham Shapira, a former Israeli chief rabbi who remains influential in religious Zionist circles, said the withdrawal plan violates Jewish law. His statement called on Orthodox soldiers to refuse orders to evacuate settlers from their homes.

At the same time, some left-leaning soldiers are refusing to serve in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Speaking this week at a special Knesset session in memory of Rabin, Sharon slammed those who urge soldiers to disobey orders.

"To refuse is to refuse to obey the laws of Israel," Sharon said. "The army is an expression of national unity and will not be held hostage to extremists."

Delivering a conciliatory message, Sharon said, "We must respect those with different opinions… We are all brothers, we are all Jews."

Eliezer Ya'ari, executive director of the New Israel Fund, which supports civil and human rights projects in Israel, said what connects the commemoration of Rabin's assassination and the protest over the Gaza withdrawal vote is that they both "pose a challenge to Israeli democracy.

"It's evident that Israel is getting back to the most basic questions of its existence – of Israel as a Jewish state and as a democracy," he said.

Last Wednesday, schools across the country held discussions and ceremonies to mark the Hebrew date of Rabin's 1995 assassination by an ultra-nationalist Jew, and to discuss how political assassination affects society.

Underscoring the divide in Israeli society, Israel Television reported that schools sponsored by the Sephardi Orthodox political party Shas did not commemorate Rabin's assassination in any way.

Also on Wednesday, the white tents were set up in a square near Jerusalem's central bus station for Gesher's day of dialogue. Inside, religious and secular teenagers debated the divisive issues. Arms waved in the air, voices were raised, but a genuine discussion took place.

"It's a microcosm of what we would want society to be like. It's also a demonstration that it's possible," said Tropper, who immigrated to Israel from New York in 1969 and set up Gesher soon afterward.

Tropper mediated a panel discussion between Yariv Oppenheimer, director general of Peace Now, and Shaul Goldstein, deputy chair of the Yesha Council.

Goldstein took issue with those who say Israel should leave Gaza because of the difficulty guarding some 7,500 Jewish settlers living amid one million Palestinians.

"We came to live in the Land of Israel. It's not easy, but it never has been," he said.

But Goldstein also rejected the use of violence to prevent the evacuation.

"Violence is forbidden," he said. "No one wants to break up Israeli society."

Oppenheimer, meanwhile, said he was alarmed by the call for a national referendum on withdrawal, as advocated by settlers and many within Sharon's ruling Likud party, despite the Knesset vote in favour of withdrawal.

"To say the prime minister has no authority is to destroy the idea of the government of Israel," he said. He suggested that settlers and their supporters put their energies into building a demographically viable and strong Israel within its pre-1967 borders.

Moshe Mandel, 17, an Orthodox Jerusalem high school student, said that hearing the various speakers and sitting together with secular teenagers at the Gesher gathering was a form of progress.

"It would be so much better if people knew each other and were not scared of each other," Mandel said. "If we can show each other that we are not monsters but humans, then the whole situation will change."

Barrage kills soldier

Sgt. Michael Chizik, 21, of Tiberias was killed when Palestinians fired mortars at Morag in the Gaza Strip. Six other soldiers were wounded in last Thursday's salvo against the community. Hamas claimed responsibility. Military sources said six mortars hit the soldiers' position while Palestinian snipers tried to pick them off. Israeli forces searched outlying areas for the attackers.

Mubarak calls Sharon

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon spoke last Thursday with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, who phoned to congratulate him on the Knesset's passing of the Disengagement Plan. Mubarak also thanked Sharon for Israel's humanitarian gesture toward Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat in allowing him to leave Ramallah for medical treatment in France. Mubarak said dialogue between Egypt and Israel would continue and that Foreign Minister Ahmed Abu Gheit would visit Israel later this month.

Soldiers kill Hamas terrorist

Israeli soldiers killed a senior Hamas member in the West Bank. Ibrahim Issa was shot Thursday evening in Kalkilya. Issa, who is also a member of the Tanzim militia, was believed to be planning suicide attacks in Israel, including a car bombing. Issa was also involved in many attempts to attack soldiers manning Israel's West Bank security barrier.

Hall owners convicted

Three owners of the Versailles wedding hall, which collapsed in May 2001, killing 23 people, were convicted on 23 counts of negligence causing death. Avraham Adi, Uri Nissim and Efraim Adiv were also convicted of causing injury to another 360 people. Dozens of guests plunged through the fourth floor of the Jerusalem hall during a wedding celebration.

Minimum-wage earners up

Some 32 per cent of employees received less than the minimum wage in 2002, up 3 per cent from the previous year, according to just-released National Insurance Institute statistics for 2001 and 2002. More than 41 per cent of the 200,000 self-employed make less than minimum wage. Their average salary fell to NIS 6,434 a month in 2002, a decline of 15 per cent, which followed a 3 per cent drop the previous year.

High-tech investments up

Investment in Israeli high-tech companies was up 43 per cent during the first three quarters of 2004 compared to the same period last year. Ninety-one companies have raised $438 million (US) so far this year, according to the IVC Research Center.

However, they said he probably decided to travel to Tel Aviv instead because of strict security at crowded areas in Jerusalem.

The explosives the bomber carried were relatively small in size, a fire brigade commander said.

Security forces upgraded their security level in the Dan region following the attack, Israel Radio reported. They arrested two suspects a short time after the bombing.

The Magen David Adom ambulance service said that at least 32 people were wounded in the attack and were evacuated to Ichilov Hospital in Tel Aviv, Wolfson Medical Center in Holon and Sheba Medical Center, Tel Hashomer. The dead were identified as two women and a man, all apparently in their 20s.

Doctors at Ichilov were treating one person who sustained critical injuries, four in serious condition and one in moderate-to-serious condition. No children were among the wounded.

"I saw lots of people lying on the ground, lots of people wounded," shopper Michal Weizman told Army Radio. "There was a woman whose entire body was torn up, all her body was torn up."

Paramedics treated dazed and wounded shoppers on the ground, amid vegetables strewn across the pavement. Police searched waste bins for additional explosives.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said the terror attack indicated that the Palestinian Authority has not changed and that Israel would continue fighting terror. "The State of Israel has not stopped and will not stop its war on the murderous terrorism operating against us.

"Today's terror attack proved that there has been no change in the Palestinian Authority. Until they take substantial steps to eradicate terror and dismantle terrorist organizations, to carry out reforms and stop the incitement, Israel will continue its policy. Words, promises and half-hearted condemnations will not suffice. We demand full implementation of the Palestinian commitments."

Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia also criticized the attack. "We don't believe that such an action serves our national cause, so we call on everyone to stop targeting civilians," he said.

Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat called his aide Nabil Abu Rudeineh from a hospital in France to condemn the terror attack and "the killing of civilians on both sides," Abu Rudeineh said.

Palestinian cabinet minister Saeb Erekat also denounced the attack, and said, "We urge the international community to exert every possible effort to revive the peace process between Israelis and Palestinians, which is the only to break this vicious cycle of violence."

The area was almost immediately closed to traffic as police set up roadblocks around the market, which is already subject to stringent security measures.

Police also set up roadblocks near Hashiva and Ginot junctions south of Tel Aviv, in the wake of reports that a taxi that may have carried the bomber had escaped from the site of the attack.

Security forces had not received a specific warning of a terror attack planned for Tel Aviv, but they had recently received 44 warnings of planned attacks.

The bombing was the first suicide attack in Israel since Sept. 22, when a Palestinian woman bomber blew herself up at a central intersection in Jerusalem, killing two border policemen.

The deadliest recent attack came on Aug. 31, when Palestinians simultaneously blew up two buses in the southern city of Be'er Sheva, killing 16.

A kid's guide to being a mensch

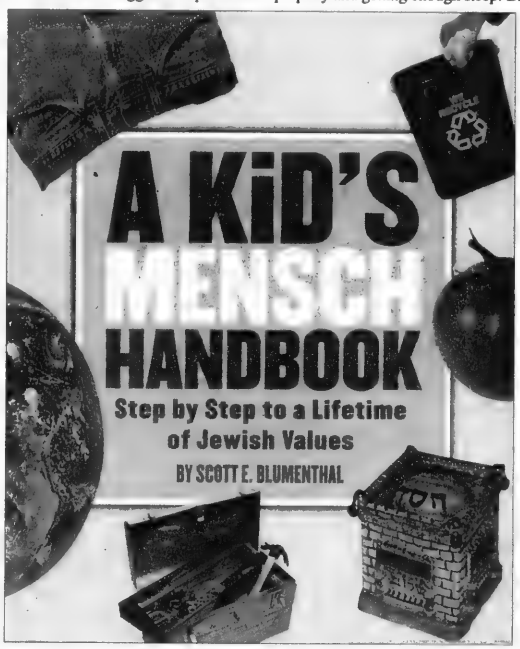
By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

At this time of the year, everyone hears a lot about doing mitzvot and being a good person – a mensch. We pray that God will see how hard we are trying to do the right thing and bless us for it.

To call someone a mensch is one of the biggest compliments Jews can give another person. The question is, what does being a mensch mean? How do you get to be a mensch? Can a kid be a mensch?

Scott Blumenthal has written a great book called A Kid's Mensch Handbook; Step by Step to a Lifetime of Jewish Values (Behrman Books, 2004). The book gives answers to all these questions, with pictures, exercises and even jokes.

Some people think that a mitzvah is what you do when you keep kosher, go to synagogue or say a blessing. Those are mitzvahs, but Blumenthal explains that being a mensch is also a mitzvah. And it doesn't just include religious duties.



In the first part of the book, he describes the characteristics of a mensch: having respect for oneself and others, and being honest, unselfish and helpful. "A mensch is, quite simply, a good person," Blumenthal says. "A mensch understands that he or she, like a stone [thrown into] a lake, has the power to affect the world in amazing ways."

Being a mensch means making the right choices, even if it is difficult. Should I stay angry with my friend forever or is it OK to forgive and forget? Should I tell someone her haircut is awful?

There are also bigger choices, ones that affect a whole community. Some of these include issues such as abortion, cloning and recycling. There might be conflict between what many people want to do and what the Torah tells us to do.

It isn't enough, Blumenthal warns, just to make a decision. You have to follow through. If you decide to help the hungry, you have to plan how you can do that, such as collecting for a food bank, and then go out and do it.

The first step in becoming a mensch is to be a mensch to yourself – by taking care of your health, being compassionate, praying to God, being content with what you have, eating properly and getting enough sleep. Blumenthal tells us to always remember that since we are created b'tzelem Elokim, in the image of God, we must respect His creation and try to copy His behaviour.

Being a mensch to yourself isn't enough, though – you have to be one to others. Be what Blumenthal calls "a family mensch" by helping out, by respecting the privacy of your brothers, sisters and parents, and by trying to encourage shalom bayit – harmony, peace and good relations.

Be a good friend. Cooperate with others. Show respect. Work for your synagogue, school, Jewish organizations and Israel.

Throughout the book, Blumenthal compares being a mensch to throwing a stone into a lake: just as the stone makes ripples that spread wider and wider, so your actions can have an impact far beyond where you expect they will.

Blumenthal also explains that the basis for the whole thing is the Torah, the Talmud and commentators such as Maimonides. The key to being a mensch, then, is Jewish learning, he says.

Throughout the book you will find things to think about, such as times you were glad you played it safe, or whether it's sometimes OK to avoid telling the truth to preserve shalom bayit. Others include thinking about how you can be kind at home, school and when no one can see you, and what does Kohelet, the book of Ecclesiastes, mean when it says "There is a time for silence and a time for speaking."

A Kid's Mensch Handbook is a lot of fun to read and work through. It's the kind of book that gives you lots to talk about with your friends and family.

Benefit of the Doubt

This story has been adapted from the Gemarah. It takes place in Israel about 2,000 years ago.

"Peretz, it's been great working for you these past few years, but I miss my family. I would like to join them for the holidays, and I intend to stay with them. I hope you don't mind."

Peretz smiled at Akiva. "Of course I'll miss you, but I understand. Return to your family."

"Thank you. In that case, all we have to take care of is these past three years' wages."

Peretz suddenly tensed. "I...I have no money to give you."

WHAT? thought Akiva. Who does this guy think he's fooling?I've been around him for three years, and I know full well how much money he has! The nerve! Akiva was about to launch into a vitriolic diatribe, but then he remembered: The Torah says, "B'tzedek tishpot amitecha — Judge your friend with righteousness". This means to give everyone the benefit of the doubt. Maybe Peretz doesn't have money right now. Yeah, maybe he just discovered some lucrative business proposal and invested it all!

"In that case," he relied, "I'll take land."

"Sorry...I don't have any of that available either."

Okay, okay, that's just a straight out lie! I mean, we're standing in his fields right now! I don't even know what he's thinking!! Oh right. B'tzedek tishpot. Maybe...he just leased them out to people and he can't give them to me.

"In that case, I'll take animals."

"I apologize...I don't have any of those either."

What in the world is this devious liar trying to pull off...oh...maybe he rented his animals out too. "Hmmm...How about clothing...or maybe blankets...pillowcases....anything?"

Peretz lowered his eyes. "I'm sorry," was all he could say.

YOU'RE SORRY? What in Heaven's name does this conniving creep think he's doing? He's trying to tell me he doesn't own clothing! I worked my back off for three entire years, and he has the audacity to...Oh, right. B'tzedek tishpot...Well, maybe...Hey! That could be it! Maybe he recently pledged everything he owns to charity!

Akiva sighed. "Chag samayach. Have a festive holiday." Slowly, he began walking home.

* * * * * * *

The sweet smells of the holiday still lingered in the air, but Akiva didn't notice. Aimlessly, he paced around in his cottage, wondering, What am I going to to do? How am I going to support my family? Three years down the drain...

"Akiva!" came a shout from outside. It was Peretz! Akiva opened the door, and there was his former boss.

"Peretz..."

"I'm so sorry it took this long. I hope you'll forgive me. I couldn't pay you before. I hope you believe me."

Akiva nodded. "I...thought maybe you had invested all your money."

"And my fields?"

"Maybe you leased them."

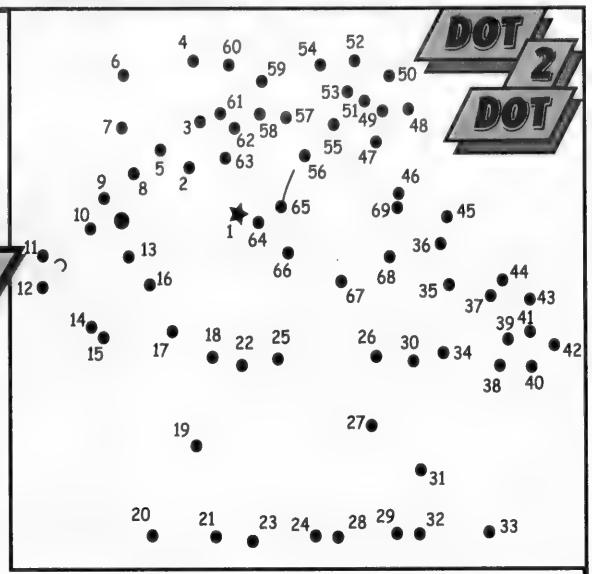
"Animals?"

"Rented out."

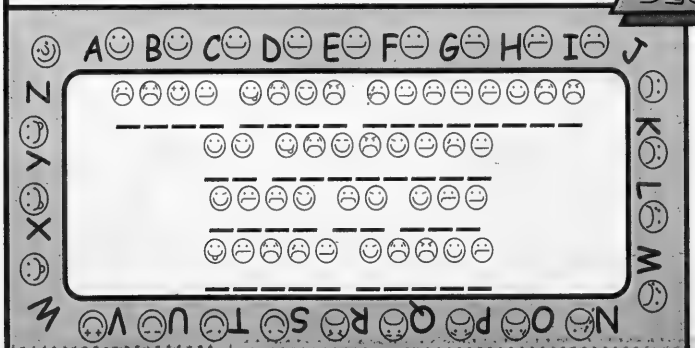
"Clothing?"

"Maybe you pledged all your property to charity."

Peretz jumped. "That's exactly what happened! I was furious with my son, and without thinking I swore I would give everything I own to charity so he wouldn't inherit anything. But the rabbis said that was a foolish thing to do and annulled my vow, and well...here, I have something for you! And with that, Peretz brought over donkeys laden with food and drink, and handed Akiva a huge bag of gold coins, his full wages for the past three years.



DECODING



The Akiva of this story later in life became the renowned scholar Rabbi Akiva. See if you can decode this well-known saying of his.

MAKEUP NEWS

With dazzle and style, this holiday season is filled with panache. Colours such as cocoa, ginger and aubergine are most popular. Bring on the glam with shimmering gloss and glimmering shine.

Spa Medica is one of the leading specialists in the field of permanent makeup, a procedure growing in popularity among women with active lifestyles looking for timesaving convenience and a break from their daily makeup routine, or women who, by reason of physical limitations, have difficulty applying makeup or who, by reason of allergies, cannot do so.

It is also used by members of both sexes who have suffered from eyelash or eyebrow loss. The non-surgical procedure, also known as micropigmentation, custom blends tiny droplets of colour to match your colouring and complexion and then skillfully implants them into the dermal layer of skin to simulate natural looking and well-defined makeup or hair.

Spa Medica employs a feathering technique in which the custom-blended pigments are gently tapped in your skin by hand with a feathering tool to create precise dimension, shape and texture. The procedure is conducted under strict sanitation and safety standards by experienced specialists employing fresh, hypoallergenic pigments containing no fragrances, emollients or other irritants. You may resume your normal activities almost immediately.

Tiffany and Co., founded in 1837, has been justly famous throughout its history for its pearls. Now you have a chance to catch some of the finest pieces, on display in the Royal Ontario Museum's fantastic September to January exhibit "Pearls: A Natural History." A collection of the mother of all pearls, the South Seas Great Whites, comes to Tiffany's flagship Toronto store at 85 Bloor St. W., from Nov. 1 to Dec. 24.

Wide fringes to the cheekbone. And the twist – no bangs! Jie tells us to get back to the rollers to create defined waves and curls that are beautiful for all lengths. Even body perms are popular this season. Hot colours are gold, hazel brown and yellow with aubergine. Winter Fashion

Treasure hunting for fashion gold

At a time when keeping up with trends can mean breaking the bank, at last it seems that there is a solution.

Lately, people have been looking into their own closets for inspiration and everything is becoming a little more personal. But the trend of personalizing your style is no longer just about initial bags. We have now moved on to creating our own memorabilia.

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Instead of buying a new necklace, why not make one of your own? With a few strands of beads or faux-pearls, some ribbon and a trinket from an old key chain, you can create your personal piece of kitsch. In recent issues of Vogue and Teen Vogue, similar necklaces were featured at a cost of $200 and up!

For those who are savvy with the sewing machine, the possibilities are endless. With a few quick stitches, you can transform any piece of junk into your own unique creation.

Still holding on to that Mickey Mouse T-shirt from the time you went to Disneyworld? Why not cut him out and sew the picture onto your bag? With such unique pieces, you can create a look all your own.

And don't be afraid to use layers to add to your outfit. Lately, people have taken to wearing everything at once, and it looks great.

In addition, mixing oddball colours and textures is a creative way to inject a little spontaneity into your wardrobe. That way, you can walk out of the house with the assurance that absolutely no one will look the same as you do.

Finding the raw materials for your new look is easier than you think. Just open your closet doors into the archives of your past, and you'll be sure to find gold.

With treasures found in her own room – badges from camp and Girl Guides, favourite hairclip, panda from old pj's, swatches from worn tank tops and jeans - Randi created a unique and personalized book bag.

Dudu Fisher quit a cantorial position to star in Les Misérables in Israel

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to the CJN

David (Dudu) Fisher

David (Dudu) Fisher is famous for his rich tenor voice, his starring role in the Israeli and Broadway productions of Les Misérables, and the fact that he won't perform Friday nights or Saturday matinées because of Shabbat.

But how many people know his musical connection with Winnipeg?

"Of course I know Winnipeg!" he says in a phone interview from New York, where he was staying after beginning a seven-city North American tour. "Winnipeg was where I started my singing career."

In 1973, when Fisher was 21 years old and had recently completed his service in the Israeli army, he sang at a family wedding in Israel. Winnipegger Morris Hersh was at the wedding and approached the singer to ask where he worked as a cantor.

"I said, 'I'm not a cantor. I've just finished the army. I'm about to go to university to study dentistry,'" says Fisher. "He said to me, 'Are you crazy? With your voice, you're going to smell stinking mouths for the rest of your life?'"

Hersh introduced himself as the president of the B'nay Abraham Synagogue in Winnipeg and invited Fisher to be the cantor for the synagogue's Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur services. Fisher agreed.

He nearly signed a full-time contract, but the Yom Kippur War broke out in Israel, and Fisher had to return. After the war, Hersh went to Israel to entice Fisher back to Winnipeg, but he declined.

"I went through a very difficult time because I lost a lot of my friends in the war. I said I couldn't leave Israel. But we stayed in touch and I was in Winnipeg many times."

Fisher cites that experience as the one that gave him the confidence to forget dentistry and study music instead at Tel Aviv University.

"It was a big problem for [my parents]. My mother always said, 'First you have a profession. Singing can be a good hobby.'" He laughs. "Thank God this mother made a mistake!"

Fisher is bringing his "hobby" to the Toronto Centre For the Arts on Sunday, Nov. 7, as part of his concert tour "Coming to America."

He will perform selections from three Jewish musicals, The Jazz Singer, Fiddler on the Roof and Yentl. Songs from the musicals are included on his new CD, also called Coming to America.

Fisher says he'll be singing some of the old favourites with a contemporary twist. "I do If I Were a Rich Man as salsa. There was a production [of Fiddler] on Broadway, but they didn't hold any auditions for it. I was upset about this. So in my show I say, 'Why couldn't they take Gloria Estevan to play Hodel?' And then I go into the salsa version. It was well received beyond my imagination."

Fisher has long been recognized as a performer who takes risks. In 1986, when he decided to leave his full-time job as a cantor and pursue musical theatre, he refused to work on Shabbat – a decision he has maintained today. But he says that choice wasn't easy.

"I'm getting so many e-mails on my website from young, Orthodox, creative people. They all want to know, what do you say about show business and religion?

"I tell them, the first thing to have on your mind with show business is you have to expect setbacks. I am the living proof of it. The only show I could do on Broadway was Les Misérables with [producer] Cameron Mackintosh. No one else accepted the fact that I couldn't work on Friday night and Saturday… It doesn't matter how great you are; it's very tough. Show business and religion is not such a good shidduch."

In the meantime, Fisher says he dreams of the day when he can have a one-man show on Broadway.

"I want to show everyone that I can close a theatre on Friday night and open it up on Saturday night. For most shows, they close on a Monday night. Why can't I close on a Friday? I really feel that Friday night is my time to be with my family," he says.

But if being an observant Jew is at such odds with being a performer, than how has he been so successful?

"Maybe because I'm good?" he says, and laughs. He continues, "Everything comes from above. They say that the moment a baby is born, a voice in heaven says what's going to be with this guy; money, wife, everything is known. Everything is set for you. That doesn't mean you get to sit at home with your legs on the sofa; you have to work very hard. But whatever is there for you, that's what you'll get. I believe in very hard work."

Music Salon is the centre of attention for Russian duo

By SVETLANA BARKAN
Special to The CJN

Pianists Inna Perkis and Boris Zarankin exude energy and enthusiasm, especially when they talk about their "child" – the Off Centre Music Salon, whose next concert is Nov. 7.

Prior to meeting Perkis and Zarankin and hearing them play, I had heard a great deal about them. My parents attended their salon performances and brought home vivid and pleasurable impressions. Therefore, to me, meeting Perkis and Zarankin last month at the Glenn Gould Studio in the CBC Broadcasting Centre in Toronto was an experience in itself!

After talking to Perkis, I quickly learned that she and Zarankin have two passions in life – their two daughters, Julia and Ilona, who often participate in the salon concerts; and the music salon itself.

Both graduates of St. Petersburg State Conservatory, Perkis and Zarankin continue the Russian academic tradition by teaching music, as well as performing.

They left Russia in the late 1970s and immigrated to Austria, where they developed a vision of a music salon – a place where different forms of art would come together in a single performance.

"This vision is critical for us," Perkis says. "Each of our concerts represents a multimedia presentation."

Their decision was influenced by the year the couple spent in Vienna, she says. "Boris fell in love with Schubert's Vienna. He fell in love with this city and found so many house concerts to attend. We played at the Bösendorfer factory. It was an unusual experience, a moment of truth, when we saw all these people bring their various background disciplines, such as philosophy or literature. It was so different from any formal concert!"

Perkis says every concert in the Off Centre series offers a combination of genres – music, poetry and prose readings, theatrical performances, philosophical discussion and even culinary sampling!

Another unique feature, she says, is that every concert is dedicated to a specific theme – for example, a Russian, a French or a German afternoon. Everything, even the pastries, relate to that particular theme.

"Our culinary 'performances' are the real hits!" Perkis says with a laugh. But on a more serious note, she adds that "the food allows the audience to feel at ease with each other and with the content, and it represents a great contribution to the overall atmosphere of the night."

Perkis and Zarankin founded their Salon 10 years ago, choosing the name Off Centre because, at the time, the Salon was located in the town of Markham, a long way from downtown Toronto.

This season represents an important landmark. Perkis and Zarankin will be working with Valery Gergiev, the general and artistic director of the Kirov Opera Theatre in St. Petersburg.

The first result of this collaboration will be seen at Off Centre's Russian-theme concert on Nov. 7, which marks the Canadian debut of Kirov's leading soprano, Olga Trifonova.

The grand opening of 2004-05 season of Off Centre Music Salon took place Oct. 17, featuring renowned Toronto Symphony Orchestra violinist Jacques Israelievitch in a French salon afternoon that wowed the audience.

Other concerts in the upcoming salon series are "Viva Viola II" on Dec. 5, where Atar Arad will be joined by violinist Scott St. John, cellist Winona Zelenka, baritone Giles Tomkins and pianists Perkins and Zarankin in a program of Schumann, Brahms and Clark; and the 10th "Schubertiad" on Jan. 23, where Perkins and Zarankin perform with pianist John Perry, soprano Monica Whicher, bass baritone Oliver Laquerre, tenor Stuart Howe and violinist Israelievitch.

On Feb. 13, Off Centre presents its German salon. The Canadian Opera Company (COC) presents, for the second time ever in Canada, Dmitry Shostakovich's Jewish Folk Poetry, Opus 79a, a cycle of Yiddish songs that Shostakovich wrote in 1948 – immediately becoming an enemy of the Soviet state. The work for soprano, contralto, tenor and orchestra will feature rising stars of COC – soprano Laura Whalen, mezzo-soprano Allyson Mchardy and bass-baritone Peter Barrett, courtesy of Richard Bradshaw, the company's general director.

The final concert in the series, on April 24, will again be held in collaboration with the Kirov Opera Theatre.

All concerts are Sunday afternoons, 2 p.m., at Glenn Gould Studio, Canadian Broadcasting Centre, 250 Front St. W., Toronto. For more information or tickets, check out the Off Centre website, www.offcentremusic.com. Tickets are also available through the Glenn Gould Studio Box Office 416-205-5555.

The 52-year-old singer has been performing for more than 30 years, but only became interested in musical theatre when he saw Les Misérables in London in 1986. It was the first musical production he had ever seen.

"I was in London and my cousin had just seen this show. She said, 'Dudu, I saw this show and I saw you in this show. You have to see this.'

"I saw it and that was it. I became a really crazy, musical guy."

Fisher went back to Israel and auditioned for the leading role of Jean Valjean. He got the part and left his full-time cantorial position. After performing in Israel, he was invited to sing with an international cast of Les Misérables for the British royal family. He played Jean Valjean on Broadway, and has performed for the Thai royal family, as well as former U.S. president Bill Clinton and U.S. Senator Hillary Clinton.

What is it like performing Les Misérables in Hebrew?

"The whole musical for me was like one big prayer," Fisher says. "For me, Jean Valjean was not a Christian. He was a righteous rabbi. He wouldn't do anything without consulting God first. That's why I felt so close to him."

During the musical, the character sings the song Bring Him Home, when a younger character is injured in battle.

Fisher performs at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, Sunday, Nov. 7. For tickets, call ticketmaster at 416-872-1111 or visit www.ticketmaster.ca.

Actress honoured to play lead in The Diary of Anne Frank

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Toronto drama critics had mixed feelings about the Bathurst Street Theatre production of The Diary of Anne Frank, which runs until Nov. 21.

But they sure liked Jennifer Waiser, the demure 26-year-old actress who plays the lead.

Waiser, who has been acting professionally since she was 18, was honoured to be Anne. "It's probably a role any actor would want, and being Jewish, I had a nice feeling doing it."

Born and raised in Ottawa, where her parents David – a psychiatrist – and Joan – a research librarian – still live, she was well-acquainted with Anne's tragic story when she auditioned for the part.

As a child, she had read her famous diary, and while preparing for the audition, she re-read it and pored over the definitive edition.

"I guess they thought I was Anne," Waiser, a graduate of Star of David Hebrew School and Ryerson Polytechnic University, said of the critics' response.

She has high regard for Anne as a person.

"She had a very good sense of humour, she was passionate about her beliefs and she was sensitive," said Waiser, who will appear in Into the Woods at the Stratford Festival after The Diary of Anne Frank. "She was an intricate and sensitive character."

Jennifer Waiser

It isn't the first time Waiser has portrayed someone Jewish. At Stratford four years ago, she played one of the daughters in Fiddler on the Roof.

The theatre has been her domain since she started her acting career.

Before appearing in The Diary of Anne Frank, she was Little Sally in the Canadian Stage production of Urinetown, a musical comedy.

And, among other roles, she was Jill in Jack and the Beanstock at the Sudbury Theatre Centre and Wendy in Peter Pan at Theatre Aquarius.

In 2002, she was nominated for a Dora Award for her portrayal of Queen Victoria in The Boy Jones.

In principle, Waiser is open to all roles. "I'm not opposed to anything. But most roles that have come my way I've wanted to do. I'm not too picky yet."

Waiser, who studied acting at Ryerson, moved to Toronto eight years ago to be in Jane Eyre at the Royal Alexandra Theatre.

She loves Ottawa, but the opportunities there are few and far between.

Occasionally, she performs in New York, where she has an agent and where her brother lives. She recently appeared in the Broadway version of Urinetown.

Lately, she has been working steadily. "I've been pretty lucky."

But in the past, when the pickings were slim, she had to settle for appearances in corporate training videos and jobs tending bar and catering.

Waiser has yet to be in a feature film, but she is hopeful that day is not too far off.

She would consider moving to Los Angeles, the centre of the U.S. film industry, should she get offers, but she would prefer living in New York if she decided to leave Canada.

"New York has a ton of theatre. I love, love New York."

Looking ahead, Waiser said that her goal is not to be rich and famous, but to be a solid and dependable actress.

All performances take place at the Bathurst Street Theatre, 736 Bathurst Street. For tickets, call 416-872-1212.

Canadian Mideast scholar makes his mark in Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Mark Heller is living his dream.

He has carved out an interesting and productive life for himself in Israel, the country of his dreams since his days in Young Judea, the Zionist youth group.

And he's a member of an elite corps of scholars whose professional career revolves around Middle East studies, which have long fascinated him.

"I'm getting paid for what would be another person's hobby," said Heller, a former Torontonian and now principal research associate at the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University (TAU).

Heller – a graduate of Bathurst Heights Secondary School, the University of Toronto and Harvard University – had been scouting for an opportunity to combine his desire to live in Israel with his ambition to land a meaningful academic position there. The Jaffee Center, originally known as the Center for Strategic Studies, was his "silver bullet."

It's an independent, middle-of the-road think tank – founded by the late Aharon Yariv, an accomplished soldier and scholar – whose mandate is to conduct relevant research and stimulate debate on Israeli policy. Administratively part of TAU but not identified with any political stream, it is privately funded and sets its own agenda.

Heller, 58, came on board in 1979 when it was established and shortly after his arrival in Israel. He has not looked back, having settled in as an Israeli – he and his Canadian wife, Barbara, a teacher retraining as a lactation consultant, have three grown children – and having established himself as one of Israel's foremost authorities on a range of political and strategic issues.

Heller, in Toronto recently to celebrate his parents' 60th wedding anniversary, writes and lectures on such diverse topics as security in the Persian Gulf and Israel's relationship with Europe.

But the Palestinian question remains at the heart of his research.

"It's the main issue," said Heller, who lives in a small community 30 kilometres from Tel Aviv. "It never goes away."

Heller, whose first published monograph was about former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin's ill-fated autonomy plan for the Palestinians, was one of the first mainstream scholars in Israel to call for a sovereign and contiguous Palestinian state as part of a comprehensive peace agreement with the Arab world.

The then-heretical proposal appeared in A Palestinian State: Implications for Israel, a sober, landmark book published by Harvard University Press in 1983, a year after Israel's invasion of Lebanon.

Describing his idea as "a recommended strategic choice for Israel," Heller suggested that the formation of a Palestinian state – based on the 1949 armistice lines and subject to minor territorial rectifications, a special regime for Jerusalem and certain verifiable military restrictions – would be negotiated with the Palestine Liberation Organization, which at the time was banned by Israel.

Heller also envisaged that a peace accord would be ratified by major Arab states, including Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and perhaps Syria, and would be implemented over a transitional period of five to 10 years.

The volume elicited some flak from hardliners resistant to territorial compromise. But in retrospect, it influenced the parameters of Israel's never-ending debate on the Palestinians.

Nearly two decades later, Heller teamed up with Sari Nusseibeh, a prominent West Bank Palestinian intellectual and activist, to write No Trumpets, No Drums: A Two State Settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict.

Heller, who supported the now-defunct Oslo peace process, backed Palestinian statehood for pragmatic and moral reasons.

"My calculations were based almost exclusively on realpolitik," explained Heller, who bears a passing resemblance to Haim Bar-Lev, the late Israeli chief of staff and cabinet minister. "But there's a moral component as well. Israel shouldn't rule the Palestinians unless it absolutely has to."

Under present-day conditions, Israel has no such need, he said.

In his estimation, Israel courts the prospect of eternal conflict with the Palestinians should their goal of statehood be thwarted. Israel can survive a protracted struggle with the Palestinians, but it would be costly for both sides.

Mark Heller

Heller, whose op-ed and scholarly pieces regularly appear in the Israeli press and academic journals, supports Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Gaza disengagement plan. But it's a "default option," there being nothing else out there on the diplomatic horizon.

If you ask, Heller will tell you that he favours separation from the Palestinians and that a negotiated Israeli withdrawal from Gaza would be preferable to a unilateral pullout.

Nevertheless, he credits Sharon with having broken with the dogma that the status quo is sustainable over the long run. "He has undergone a major political transformation, but where it will take him, nobody knows."

Heller acknowledged that his perplexity was heightened when Sharon's aide, Dov Weisglass, recently declared that the Gaza plan is intended to consign the peace process to "formaldehyde" and indefinitely defer the establishment of a Palestinian state.

In Heller's view, Yasser Arafat – the president of the Palestinian Authority and the head of the PLO – is either unwilling or unable to commit himself unequivocally to a two-state solution or Israel's legitimacy. This leads him to contend that Israel does not have a reliable partner in Arafat.

Yet Heller has not reached definitive conclusions as to whether Arafat's real objective is ending Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza or working for Israel's destruction as a Jewish state.

"I don't know what his aim is, aside from survival."

Heller is not surprised that the "road map" peace plan – the internationally sponsored initiative that foresees a viable Palestinian state by 2005 – has petered out. "Neither side, particularly the Palestinians, was committed to it."

Although the road map is in "suspended animation," Heller believes its chances of being revived cannot be discounted. But even if it is resuscitated, he said, it will lead nowhere unless Israel and the Palestinians truly commit themselves to partition.

He confessed that his optimism about Oslo's usefulness evaporated before the failure of the Camp David summit in the summer of 2000 and the outbreak of the Palestinian uprising several months later.

"The problem was that Oslo didn't specify in advance where it was all going. Israeli leaders – Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres – suffered from a failure of political nerve.

"They didn't tell Israelis that Oslo meant a two-state solution. Yes, they were not honest. But the primary responsibility lies with Arafat."

He broke his promise not to pursue the conflict through violent means and not to encourage an atmosphere of incitement against Israel, Heller said.

"There were shortcomings on both sides, and enough blame to go around."

As far as the current intifadah goes, Israel has won the first round on points, Heller said. "But it isn't a knockout punch, and there may be another round."

Heller is not hopeful that peace is around the corner. "We're not there yet." But he is reasonably confident that "some kind of reconciliation" is in the offing.

Without mentioning names, he said there are Palestinian leaders who are prepared to reach a practical accommodation with Israel, should conditions be right.

1944 Canadian novel preached message of tolerance for Jews

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Gwethalyn Graham's 1944 novel Earth and High Heaven is said to bear the distinction of being the first book published in Canada by a non-Jewish author that deals centrally with Jewish themes and characters.

Since it has been out of print for decades, its recent reissue by Cormorant Books of Toronto offers a welcome opportunity to recount the intriguing history of the book and its author, who was just 31 when it first came out.

Set in the Montreal of 1942, Earth and High Heaven focuses on the intense, star-crossed romance between the humble but enterprising Marc Reiser and Erica Drake, whose wealthy Protestant father refuses to meet or consider him because he is a Jew. One reviewer summed it up as a Romeo and Juliet set in Westmount with part of The Merchant of Venice thrown in for good measure.

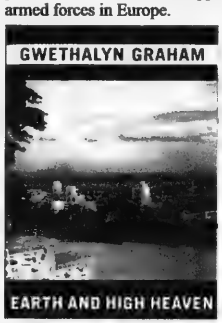
Published simultaneously in the United States and England, then in Canada, it was a runaway bestseller and remained on the New York Times bestseller list for more than a year. It sold over a million copies in English and was eventually translated into 18 languages and braille. A special print-run of 350,000 was shipped to members of the American armed forces in Europe.



It proved more lucrative to Graham than any agent could have imagined. Collier's Magazine paid $7,500 to run an abridged version of it, the Literary Guild of America paid $42,000 to make it a club selection, and Samuel Goldwyn paid $100,000 for movie rights.

Graham spent years successfully convincing the tax department to allow authors to prorate such windfalls over a three-year period to allow them to escape the highest tax brackets.

At a time when Western democracies were being shocked into recognizing the unspeakable evil deeds of the Nazis, Earth and High Heaven's message of social tolerance for Jews struck a massively popular chord.

Graham had hit upon this theme even before American author Laura Z. Hobson, whose 1946 novel Gentleman's Agreement presented a parallel depiction of the genteel, pervasive anti-Semitism that operated across all levels of American society, quietly keeping Jews out of jobs, professions, hotels and country-clubs.

Graham's book even preceded the Canadian Jewish Congress's groundbreaking campaign for equal civil rights for all Canadians that began in the late '40s, after the horrors of the Holocaust had fully filtered into public awareness.

Earth and High Heaven earned its author a Governor General's award – her second. Her previous novel Swiss Sonata had garnered the same award in 1938, when she was only 25. Earth and High Heaven also won a prize from the Saturday Review of Literature as the best work on race relations.

What prompted a nice Anglican girl from Toronto's posh Rosedale suburb, a graduate of the private Havergal School for Girls, into becoming an internationally-admired champion of social justice and minority rights for Jews?

Born as Gwethalyn Brown in 1913, Graham often credited her Scottish-born grandfather, James Frederick McCurdy, as a major influence. McCurdy, who lived with the family, headed the department of oriental languages at the University of Toronto and was a renowned scholar of Hebrew and Sanskrit.

"I remember that he would not tolerate the use of any of the defamatory slang words which label national or religious groups on this continent – such words as wop, mick, hun or chink," she once recalled.

Her father was a prominent barrister with a reputation for sticking up for the underdog; her mother an active socialite and campaigner for the art gallery and symphony. Her sister Isabel became a freelance journalist who specialized in causes of social justice; her famous 1966 book The Trial of Steven Truscott, written under her married name of Isabel LeBourdais, would shock Canadians with its credible assertion that an innocent 14-year-old had been falsely convicted of rape and condemned to hang.

After returning from a Swiss finishing school, Graham shocked friends and family by eloping at 19, but her husband proved unfaithful and the marriage was brief. After the publication of Swiss Sonata, she returned to Europe for six months and encountered myriads of Jewish and other refugees, desperate to escape the insidious Nazi regime.

That autumn, back in Canada, she circulated petitions, gave speeches and wrote two articles for Saturday Night, pleading for a more compassionate national immigration policy; she even took some so-called displaced persons from Europe into her home.

She also became emotionally involved with a Jewish-Canadian lawyer, and was stunned when her father refused to meet him. Thus, her own experiences formed the basis for the story and characters of Earth and High Heaven, which literary historian Greg Gatenby has described as a "thinly disguised account of the motives and effects of anti-Semitism amidst a family that regards itself as cultured and liberal."

In his memoirs, screenwriter Garson Kanin recorded that Goldwyn considered Graham's novel the most beautiful love story he'd ever read and fully intended turning it into a movie. Goldwyn hired a team of six screenwriters, photographed potential locations in Montreal and mentally cast Katharine Hepburn and Gregory Peck as the romantic leads.

But the publication of Gentleman's Agreement in 1946, and 20th Century-Fox's quickly-produced movie of the novel – starring Peck, no less – dashed Goldwyn's plans to bring Earth and High Heaven to the big screen.

Like author Margaret Mitchell after Gone With the Wind, Graham was sidelined by success: she produced no more novels and only one non-fiction work, Dear Enemies, which did not have widespread appeal. Stricken with a sudden brain tumour, she died in 1965 at the age of 52.

Offering an introduction by Norman Ravvin, Cormorant's trade paperback edition of Earth and High Heaven is available in bookstores for $19.95.

This 1948 Bantam paperback edition of Earth and High Heaven highlighted the story's romantic drama. Samuel Goldwyn intended turning the novel into a movie until Twentieth Century Fox rushed Laura Hobson's novel Gentleman's Agreement onto the screen.

Liver transplant could save patient's life

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Entrepreneur Sheldon Farberman has a message for the community: fill in your organ donor card.

It is not merely an academic concern for him. The 45-year-old Farberman is in desperate need of a liver transplant for himself.

He was diagnosed with cirrhosis of the liver nearly two years ago, when the gastroenterologist who was treating him for Crohn's disease became concerned about his low hemoglobin and platelet levels. After months of tests, and a liver biopsy, his hematologist gave him the diagnosis. "I was floored," he said. "It hit me like 'whoof,' and what composure I had, I lost."

Sheldon Farberman and his family.

Like many people, Farberman said, he didn't really understand the function of the liver. A manual prepared by the Toronto Hospital Liver Transplant Team (THLTT) explains that it "builds special proteins to prevent bleeding; filters blood and helps fight infection; makes bile to break down fat in food; removes poisons and toxins from anything eaten, breathed or drunk; builds, stores and releases sugar for energy; stores vitamins and minerals; helps break down proteins in food; and sends hormones to other organs in the body."

Contrary to myth, cirrhosis of the liver is not necessarily caused by excessive alcohol consumption (Farberman said that he barely drinks at all). Rather, it can be caused by hepatitis B and C, certain drugs, chemicals, metabolic or inherited disorders, and autoimmune chronic active hepatitis.

Farberman has fought Crohn's disease for many years. However, he said, it is very unusual for Crohn's patients to develop liver disease.

He has many of the usual symptoms of cirrhosis, including jaundice, weakness, and tiredness, as well as the more unusual periodic loss of his voice and loss of night vision.

The effect of his illness has been devastating, not just to him, but to his wife of nine years, Chrysta, and his two children, Noah, 6, and Julia, 3.

Over the years, he has been in the travel industry, owned restaurants and run concessions at the CNE. Now, he can't work. The family is dependent on Chrysta's earnings as a maternity nurse.

"I worry about keeping our home life together. I don't want to lose the house, but we have a mortgage," he said.

While Farberman said that he is not afraid of dying, seeing it as "a part of life," he is worried about how his children will turn out, and whether they will retain their Jewishness in the face of a father who can't take them to shul, or do the religious things he considers kids need. "I hope to be around for my son's bar mitzvah," he said wistfully.

As his daughter runs in to model a new skirt and sweater, and to give him a hug, he lamented missing her growing-up years as well. In his present condition, his only hope in the long term (and the long term isn't very long) is for a liver transplant. There must be a blood match. Farberman, for instance, is type A+, and so can receive a liver from someone of the same blood type or type O. Even if a liver is a match, other considerations may apply to both donor and patient, such as differences in body size, the presence of HIV or active hepatitis or unexpected illnesses.

Transplant organs are procured through the Multiple Organ Retrieval and Exchange Program, which is based at the Toronto Hospital. Organs are shared according to the severity and type of illness of the patient, the location of the donor, and the compatibility of donor and recipient blood type. Race, sex and age are not considered.

Even if a liver appears to be acceptable, it is entirely possible for the surgeon to discover a problem immediately before the transplant, and have to abort the procedure.

Another option is a living donor transplant. A partial transplant is possible because the liver can regenerate itself, which happens in a matter of months.

Transplants from both types have about the same level of success, says the THLTT manual.

After receiving the liver (or the partial liver), the patient must take heavy doses of drugs to ward off rejection of the new organ. The cost is enormous, although the government will pay for some of them, under its Trillium Drug Program. Some drugs are covered by private drug plans.

Even after receiving the transplant, there is the danger of the body rejecting the new organ. There may be complications from the surgery or the possibility of infection, particularly as immunosuppressive medications decrease the body's ability to fight it. Also, cytomegalovirus, a common virus after transplants, may develop.

There is another possibility that Farberman is mulling over; going to the United States. A hospital in Texas will perform the operation, but at a cost of $700,000. Which Farberman simply doesn't have.

Meanwhile, he waits. But he is not idle. He wants to make the public aware of liver disease. "It doesn't only hit people who abuse themselves," he stresses.

Sign an organ donor card, and tell your family about your wishes. "It is such a gift. It is giving to someone in the time of your need to deal with your grief, and their need, to deal with their disease."

He is also urging rabbis to encourage their congregants to sign organ donor cards, as some Jews still think that it is not permitted.

Meanwhile, Farberman waits. He undergoes constant tests of one sort or another and frequent minor surgeries, and worries about the constant risk of infection, which will prevent him from having a transplant should a liver become available.

He treasures each moment with his children and being able to sit outside in the nice weather. And he waits and dreams.

Temple Sinai cantor releases CD

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

A recent CD by Severin Weingort, cantor emeritus of Temple Sinai, reflects his love of chazzanut and classical Yiddish songs.

A Collection of Cantorial and Yiddish Songs includes prayers such as Sim Shalom and Avinu Malkeinu and the Yiddish songs A Brief Tsum Liander Rebin and Sha-Shtil (Der Rebbe mit Chassidim).

"For many years, members of Temple Sinai have asked me to produce a CD," says Weingort. "This is my first, and I hope to make others."

Weingort, who has a rich baritone voice, sang leading roles with the Canadian Opera Company (COC) for 15 years before embarking on his career as a cantor in 1966.

He said he had a love of music from an early age. His grandfather was a rabbi, and Weingort was often a soloist at school from the time he was seven.

Born in Radom, Poland, Weingort was 13 years old when World War II broke out. He, his father, a jewelery manufacturer, his mother and his brother, Yitzchok, were in the Radom ghetto.

Weingort participated in the Warsaw Uprising, joining the Second Polish Battalion. In 1944, he was captured and taken to Germany as a prisoner of war.

In 1951, Weingort met Barbara Gurman, his wife-to-be, at Toronto's Sunnyside Pool. A survivor, and one of the first orphans brought to Canada, she had arrived with her sister, Ella.

Weingort studied voice and music at the opera school of the Royal Conservatory of Music and began an acting career.

He was a guest artist in numerous COC productions, including Mendelssohn's Elijah and Avodat Hakodesh. He peformed with the Kitchener-Waterloo Symphony Orchestra, sang on television and radio and acted in plays.

Weingort served as chazzan for High Holy Day services for several years at Holy Blossom Temple.

"I was aware of the richness of music of Jewish composers," he says. "I studied traditional chazzanut and Torah chanting with Cantor Berle Charloff [a famous Toronto cantor]. And he wrote me a Shabbat service."

In 1966, Weingort accepted a full-time position at Temple Sinai as music director and cantor, a position he held for 30 years, and from which he retired in 1996.

"When I started at Temple Sinai, there were 400 families. Now there are close to 2,000 families," he says.

He initiated new programs there, including an annual Yiddish Night. He says his joy was in involving children, as well as adults, in the Torah reading.

In 1972, Weingort became a certified cantor of the Hebrew Union College. He served on the board of the American Conference of Cantors for many years.

He notes that although he tried to steer his four daughters away from the arts, they are all involved with them in some form. Sharon Ventura is an artist, Lori Cotton is a pianist and piano teacher, Karen Lower is a pianist, and Robin Rosenbaum is an actor, writer and director.

A Collection of Cantorial and Yiddish Songs is available at the gift shop at Temple Sinai and at Negev Importing.

Fichman, teammate defeated in final of tennis tourney in Spain

TORONTO — The Canadian team ended an impressive run at the Junior Fed Cup championships in Barcelona, Spain, with a second-place finish. The unseeded Canadians were stopped recently in the final by sixth-seeded Argentina 2-0.

"The girls gave it their all. They worked really hard but in the end were outlasted," said Rene Simpson, Canadian Junior Fed Cup captain. "They played well all week and had some big wins."

In the first match of the final day, Valerie Tetreault, the No. 2 seed from St-Jean-sur-Richelieu, Que., was defeated by Betina Jozami 6-1, 6-3. In the second singles match, Sharon Fichman of Toronto was stopped by Florencia Molinero 6-3, 4-6, 3-6.

With Argentina clinching the win, both teams declined to play the doubles match.

In the semi-finals leading up to the championship contest, the Canadian juniors defeated the fifth-seeded team from the Netherlands 2-1.

Tetreault was the first Canadian to take to the clay and pulled off a three-set win over Marrit Boonstra 1-6, 6-1, 6-4.

Fichman, the youngest girl in the competition at 13, faced her good friend Babianne Schoofs in the second singles match and came away with the win, 6-4, 6-1.

Fichman is a three-time national champion, including her most recent win at the Under 18 Outdoor championships in August. Fichman's resumé includes wins at the Eddie Herr International in Bradenton, Fla., and the Junior Orange Bowl in Miami.

She recently made a quarterfinal appearance at the 45th Italian Open in Milan, a Grade A event on the junior circuit. Prior to the tournament, Fichman was listed at 67th on the International Tennis Federation (ITF) junior rankings list.

Finally. The Red Sox win. Life is sweet.

By RANDY SPIEGEL
Special to The CJN

My eyes hurt, my entire body is exhausted and my heart feels like it is beating normally for the first time in weeks.

Anyone who has ever paced the field of play in any sport, who has entered the theatre of competition or slapped the leather of a ball glove prior to a victory can understand the thrill leading to victory and all it takes to get you to that moment.

These have been the longest 86 years of my life.

As I sit clacking out thoughts while wearing the painter's hat I bought after witnessing Yaz's last game (please do not say, "Yaz who?"), I am flooded with emotions that some may find childish.

Well, quite frankly, it is the child in me that is most enjoying this moment.

It is the child in me who constantly struggles to free himself or inject himself into the seriousness and heavy parts of life, desperately seeking a fluffy interlude while remaining focused on the task at hand.

It is the carefree "what-does-it-matter-what-time-I-get-home-for-dinner" attitude that has made this World Series so much fun. It is the late nights and the phone calls and the reaching out to touch so many who have, even if for the first time, enjoyed the game that rolls out the summer carpet and brings the dead of winter forward.

It is the last-one-standing struggle that enthralls me from season to season. And most especially, it is the moments spent with others, sharing their fantasies and making them my own that has me basking in a moment unlike any other.

It is the fun of it and the team feeling – that feeling of belonging to something bigger than myself – that allows me to recall past experiences and consider opportunities in everyday life in which that never-give-up attitude prevails and in which being part of something so dependent on the performance and co-operation of others does indeed make anything possible.

I saw, this day, the Babe, standing on the other side, smoking his cigar as my friends stood beside him, taking it all in, while history came to shake his hand. They, of course, knew how it would end, and all that remained was for the event to unfold.

It has been a wild ride and tomorrow only brings the inability to grasp the magnitude of the reality and the lack of knowing what to do next. Tomorrow means the start of feeling normal, of rebirth in a kind of purity that all is right with everything, at least for a while.

So many new comforting emotions, and so powerful the imagery that each of us can find, if we look. One thing is for sure – we will all remember this moment as long as we live, in our own way. And perhaps beyond. Is that not truly what memories are all about?

And now, back to our regularly scheduled program.

Life does indeed go on, albeit just a little bit differently and just a little more sweetly.

Finally.

Randy Spiegel is a finally fulfilled Red Sox fan who lives in Toronto.

Maccabi Canada recruiting young leaders for 2005 games

Maccabi Canada has started a recruitment drive for young people to serve as "madrichim" (staff leaders) with the Canadian team at next summer's 17th Maccabiah Games in Israel.

"For many [young people], this is a unique opportunity to visit Israel and compete in an international sports event with Jewish peers," said David Bromstein, a member of Maccabi Canada's national athletic council.

The madrichim will be part of an international network of Maccabi leaders who will work with athletes under age 18 as part of the educational staff and provide supervision, he said.

Candidates must be between the ages of 20 and 25, have been to Israel at least once before, have proven experience working with teens/and or in family education, have proven experience as an informal educator and want to become part of a worldwide network of young Maccabiah leaders.

Successful candidates will have to commit to be in Israel from July 5-21, 2005, as well as participate in a training seminar throughout the year.

A second Maccabi Canada program is aimed at teenagers with a passion for journalism and the media. Successful candidates for that program will join an international media team that will cover the Maccabiah events and post daily reports on the Internet.

The teens will be an integral part of the Junior Maccabiah and participate in all its events, including the opening ceremonies, evening events, daily programs and tours. They will stay in the same athletes' village that will accommodate junior athletes in Israel.

Candidates must be 16-18 years old, have a background in either journalism or photography or possess interviewing skills, be knowledgeable in English, Spanish or Hebrew and have had some involvement in the Maccabi movement.

The 17th Maccabiah Games will bring together thousands of Jewish athletes from around the world for 10 days of elite athletic competition (in junior, youth and open age categories) while celebrating Israeli and Jewish culture and heritage.

The goals of the Maccabi movement are to foster Jewish identity and love for Israel through the international, cross-cultural language of sports.

"The Junior Maccabiah is an unforgettable experience," said Bromstein. "The thrill of being with Jewish athletes from around the world in the Jewish homeland is incredible."

For more information, Bromstein can be reached at dabrommer@cogeco.ca or 905-627-8081. Maccabi Canada can be contacted at 416-398-0515 or on the Internet at www.maccabicanada.com.

AIDS in Africa: making a difference

Paige Pedlar is seven years old. When I grow up, I want to be just like her.

She is a published author with a beautiful soul. When I eagerly purchased her $10 book, I asked her to autograph it for me. She gave a cute little sigh, glanced up at her supportive mother and then signed her first name on the inside cover.

Pedlar wrote Who Will Cuddle Them When They Sleep herself and did all her own illustrations. She donates $4 from the sales of the book to help AIDS orphans in Africa. Pedlar, who is from Whitby, Ont., encourages others to save dying babies.

I met her a few weeks ago at a multi-faith event called "AIDS in Africa: A Call to Action." It was an evening sponsored by Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

The night began with spunky African dancer Melanie Rosen and her dancing and drumming ensemble. Rosen, a Thornhill native, has always been intrigued with African culture and studied African dance in Ghana before completing her master's degree in expressive arts therapy. She passionately danced down the aisles of the First Narayever Synagogue. It was reminiscent of the joyful chassidic dancing I once witnessed. I was lost in the spiritual music at First Narayever and momentarily forgot I was at an event to educate myself about HIV/AIDS. I was reawakened to the cause once the speakers began.

They included Rev. Bill Peacock, a United Church minister who works as a multi-faith chaplain; Larry Gilman, president of the Beth Israel Synagogue in Peterborough; midwife Jennifer Reidi; and Ve'ahavta staff member Sarah Zelcer. All of them have played integral roles in the fight against HIV/AIDS.

I learned that a whole generation is dying in Africa. Half a million babies are born there with HIV every year. Half a million! That is a baby a minute. In the time it takes to read this column, three babies will be born with this painful disease. I can barely comprehend this horrifying statistic. The disease is not slowing down, and the pictures I see and the stories I hear at First Narayever overwhelm me.

Ve'ahavta's HIV/AIDS team has made the ground-breaking discovery that, for only $7, transmission of HIV from a pregnant mother to child can be decreased more than 50 per cent of the time.

I did my own research after the event and learned that the number of orphans in Africa will double from the current 11 million to 20 million by 2010 as a result of the AIDS crisis. That is just over five years away! We have to do something. We may live in different countries, but we are all human beings who feel pain, sadness, anger and fear.

We should work together and inform our friends, our families, our colleagues and our communities about the crisis. We can form partnerships with African communities and develop a holistic self-help response. Go online to websites such as www.allafrica.com or www.worldvision.ca and educate yourself so you can spread the word. You can volunteer at a local hospice, form an AIDS support chapter in your school or workplace to raise awareness, or write your MP and ask the federal government to follow through on legislation that would make affordable medication available to developing countries. Contact Ve'ahavta and ask them to speak at your next meeting or function regarding the AIDS epidemic. Ask your friends or shul group to fund an HIV/AIDS mother-to-child prevention program. Tell everyone you know that the casualties from all the current wars in the world do not equal the number of people dying from AIDS. Scientists are calling AIDS in Africa the greatest plague known to humanity.

Rev. Peacock, who recently returned from Zimbabwe, said it best toward the end of his speech. "Now that you know what is happening in Africa, how will you make a difference?"

An ice cream company and Eden

I had a thought about the Adam and Eve story, and why the first couple ate from the Tree of Knowledge. It includes the idea that it was their way of saying to God, "Thank you for the Garden of Eden and the perfection sprouting from its roots. We prefer, however, to experience life outside of it, where imperfection exists; a place where we can scrape our knees, find our personal gifts, and celebrate life through self-exploration. Eden should come later."

According to this interpretation, eating the fig was in fact Adam and Eve's second birth – as the passage says, "and their eyes were open" – and a powerful statement within Judaism about the imperative of self-development and self-actualization.

Over time, I have come to believe that all of us have a gift, something we are exceptional at that, if developed, might take us back to the proverbial garden and help us reach a point that Pirkei Avot refers to as "samayach b'chelko" – where we are happy with our lot.

Unfortunately, I have met many people who have chosen not to develop their gift, but who have instead opted for a path that was expected of them, or one offering unfulfilling wealth.

Recently, I spoke with a woman at a shul event who complimented me on my articles. I was empowered by her kindness and recognition of my efforts to nurture my writing and myself.

I asked her what she did. She mumbled that she worked in a particular business and added, "I hate it." I asked her why she spent so much time doing something she detested. She looked askance with sad discomfort, lowered her resigned eyes and responded emptily. As she walked away, I encouraged her to skip home – to dream like we did when we were young and pursue her hopes with a vengeance.

I am a lucky man, because I figured out that community work is my passion, and I chose it as my career. Soon enough, I discovered an inner peace we call purpose, and it gave the confident gait that one sees in a content man. To this day, I often lie in bed reviewing my day in the sweet silence of night, and I am in utter awe of the reality that I am part of creating a solution in Sudan, and of alleviating HIV/AIDS in Africa and homelessness in Toronto and Israel.

Discovering my gift was momentous, and I love to watch other do the same. I have joy for my friend Mark Diamond, who gave up a career he was not passionate about to pursue his charming aspiration of buying and co-directing Camp Manitou. I am inspired by a member of my family, Art (Rosie) Rosenzweig, who followed his childhood dream and purchased – and runs – St. Clair Ice Cream. How awesome is that?

Bite the fig. Don't believe scared dreamers who say that being a poet is no way to make a living. It is living, and had someone convinced Dylan Thomas to be an actuary, the world would have missed out on many great verses.

Eat from the Tree of Knowledge and chase your wonderment. If you feel trapped in a job because you're trying to keep up with the Goldsteins, consider that the grandest gift you can give your children is the true inner satisfaction that comes from the cultivation of your soul.

Leave the Garden. Sing. Write. Be a chef, a midwife or a rabbi. Investigate your gifts, regardless of your age, because, ultimately, the reward of self-development is the tastiest fruit of all – and a ticket back to the Garden of Eden.

Skip home!

"When one hasn't a touch of the poet, one stands some chance of being a poem." –G. K. Chesterton

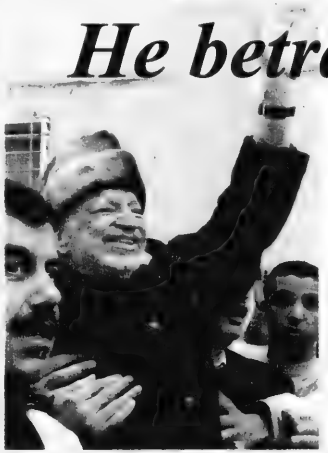
He betrayed his own people



In the end, Yasser Arafat's death was like his life: replete with lies, deception and duplicity. An announcement of his demise was expected some time this week. Palestinian officials were to have flown to Paris, where Arafat's lifeless body has lain at the Percy military hospital, to settle affairs with Suha Arafat and to tell the world what many insiders have known for more than a week: the arch-terrorist is dead.

In the ensuing days, as his people mourn, many government leaders, heads of state and other fawning dignitaries will attempt to burnish the record of the man's life, conflating myth with fact, reality and fantasy.

Editorial

But the irreducible truth of Yasser Arafat's life, more clearly visible these past four years, is that ultimately, he failed and betrayed his own people.

In the international mind, to be sure, he personified the Palestinian cause. From the moment in 1974 when he addressed the UN General Assembly, his gun at his side, he became the worldwide symbol of the Palestinian movement.

But his achievements on the ground never advanced beyond the realm of subjugation, brutalization, corruption and terror, for he knew no other ways.

Arafat attempted to subvert King Hussein's authority in Jordan in 1968. The king then expelled him and his Palestine Liberation Organization during the month Arafat would eventually call Black September.

Martin pledges support for Israel at CIJA dinner

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA – In a show of support last week for Israel and Canadian Jewry, nearly 1,000 people attended the inaugural parliamentary dinner of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA).

Prime Minister Paul Martin assured the assembled group that Canada supports Israel. "Canada will not, nor will we ever, waiver in our support for Israel," he said. "We believe strongly, incontrovertibly, in Israel's right to defend itself against those who would destroy it."

He mentioned he had earlier telephoned Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to congratulate him on the preceding week's successful vote in the Knesset authorizing Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip. Martin expressed support for the plan. "Sharon's plan for Gaza, in my view, will enhance Israel's security and lead in the direction of peace," he said.

Both Martin and Opposition leader Stephen Harper jokingly pointed out how the CIJA dinner was able to bring together the leaders and many representative of all four federal political parties.

MONTREAL — Concordia University denied that it's ready to invite former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak to speak on campus, but said it "intends" to do so before June, if adequate security measures – both physical and financial – can be put in place.

"The university's position has not changed and our primary concern remains the safety and security of our students, faculty, staff and our guests," Concordia president Federick Lowy said Friday in a statement.

The university's latest statement is at variance with a congratulatory press release issued by FEDERATION CJA late last Thursday in which it "welcome[s] the decision of Concordia's president and board to invite [the former Israeli prime minister]

Canada

Funds for Ear Checks

OTTAWA — The Canadian International Development Agency said it will give $383,000 to the Canada International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO) to help sustain programs for the early detection of hearing loss in Jordanian infants. Since 2000, some 17,000 babies have been tested and many have received hearing aids. In 1998, Toronto-based CISEPO brought Jordanian, Israeli and Palestinian doctors together in the Middle East Association for Managing Hearing Loss to promote peace via scientific co-operation.

JNF Dinner Protested

OTTAWA — A spokesperson for Ottawa Mayor Bob Chiarelli told The CJN last week he would attend the city's Nov. 15 Jewish National Fund Negev Dinner, despite letters from Palestinian supporters in Ottawa urging him not to go. Chiarelli is honorary chair of the event, which features Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz as speaker. The Ottawa Sun, quoting from letters Chiarelli received, reported that the writers objected to Dershowitz's defence of Israeli practices against Palestinian terrorism, and the fact JNF is "associated with B'nai Brith and Canadian Jewish Congress," which "advocate for Israel, not for peace and justice" and "are an affront to Canadian values and to Arab and Muslim Canadians." In response, the Canada-Israel Committee urged local Jews to write the mayor and noted that dinner proceeds will go to a picnic area in the Negev, which is in undisputed territory.

World

Article Angers Jews

LONDON — The British Medical Journal has been flooded with complaints from Jewish doctors, community groups and the Israeli Embassy over an article claiming Israeli soldiers are "routinely authorized to shoot to kill children in situations of minimal or no threat." Psychiatrist Derek Summerfield's "Palestine: The Assault on Health and Other War Crimes," published Oct. 16, also said the West Bank security barrier is a sign of Israel's "expansive, aggressive colonization." The journal's deputy editor defended the article's publication and said she will run a response from an Israeli doctor. The journal has run three similar articles by Summerfield in the last year.

Film's Claims Probed

NEW YORK — The president of Columbia University has asked the school's provost to probe claims made in an unreleased documentary that professors in its Middle East and Asian languages and culture department have intimidated Jewish students in class and blamed them for Palestinian deaths, the New York Times reported. One of the 10 students interviewed in Unbecoming Columbia – made by the David Project, a Boston group that documents on-campus harassment of Jewish students – said that in one history class, a professor showed a film saying Arabs have a stronger claim to Israel than Jews, and later said she could not have ancestral ties to the land because her eyes are green. One of the professors named in the film called it a "racist witchhunt" and pro-Israel propaganda.

Protests Over Arafat

PARIS — Some 50 Jews protested last week outside the hospital near Paris where Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat was being treated. The protesters, who carried Israeli flags and anti-Arafat banners, tried to enter hospital grounds before riot police pushed them back. Police said they were from the Jewish Defense League. No arrests were made. And in New York, the American Board of Rabbis called for a boycott of "anything French" for "the harbouring of Arafat."

More Graves Defaced

PARIS — Some 500 people, including Christians and Muslims, attended an interfaith ceremony at a Jewish cemetery in eastern France that was desecrated with anti-Semitic and racist slogans. The graffiti, found Oct. 30 on 92 graves at the site in Brumath near Strasbourg, included swastikas and neo-Nazi insignia. Since April, more than 400 graves at Jewish, Christian and Muslim cemeteries have been desecrated in the Alsace region.

Stone Rededicated

WELLINGTON — An Oct. 31 event in the New Zealand city of Wanganui rededicated a gravestone that was hit with a hammer and daubed with a swastika the previous week. It was the third recent desecration in the country, after 100 stones were damaged in two Wellington Jewish cemeteries.

Paul Martin

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Paul Martin called Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon last week to express regret and outrage over the recent terror attack in Tel Aviv's Carmel Market and to congratulate Sharon on the Knesset's passing of his Gaza disengagement plan despite domestic opposition, Israel's Foreign Ministry announced.

Referring to the bombing, Martin said the Canadian people feel solidarity with Israel at such times. He also said Canada supports the Gaza plan and is ready to help implement it.

Sharon thanked Martin for his friendship toward Israel and invited him to visit. He also told him that he is determined to implement the disengagement plan according to the set timetable, and that he initiated the plan in the absence of a Palestinian partner who could implement the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan. He also told Martin the Gaza plan has the potential to revive the "road map" once the Palestinians fight terrorism, dismantle terrorist infrastructure and implement government reforms.

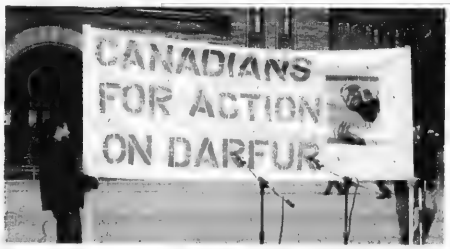
Diverse Canadians rally to support Darfur



About 700 people rallied at Queen's Park Sunday to call to the international community to protect the people of Sudan's Darfur region, where ethnic cleansing and massacres have led to the displacement of about 1.6 million people, and the death of more than 7,000. The rally was organized by a coalition of more than 40 community and religious groups, including Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region/UJA Federation of Greater Toronto; the United Church of Canada; KAIROS (Canadian Ecumenical Justice Initiatives; Ve'ahavta; Simon Wiesenthal Centre; B'nai Brith; Save the Children Canada; and Muslim Canadian Congress.

Democracy cherished

From the editor's desk

Generally speaking, we cherish our democratic way of life in the same way we cherish our good health, more in its absence than in its daily, but unnoticed, sustaining presence.

There are, however, certain occasions and special moments when we are stirred to think more thoughtfully about the higher truths of democracy's canopy of freedom. I draw readers' attention to three recent such occasions.

Last week, the still relatively new Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) held its inaugural conference and parliamentary dinner in Ottawa. (The news coverage of the conference begins on page 1 of this issue of the paper.)

The conference was called, fittingly, Democracy in Action. It was, essentially, an extended seminar cum field trip on Parliament Hill for hundreds of community activists from across the country. As one participant from Toronto told The CJN, it was classic grassroots activity.

Canadian supporters of Israel met with, debated and engaged their representatives in Parliament and, in so doing, affirmed one of the core activities that underpins all democratic process in all democracies throughout the world: the accountability of the elected to the electors.

The crowning event of the conference however, was the dinner on Monday night at the Westin Hotel. Nearly 1,000 people were there. Some 150 of the attendees, or nearly one out of every six people, was an MP or a senator.

Any student of Canadian politics will tell you that there are not 150 ridings, or 75 ridings, or even 50 ridings, in which Jews tip the electoral balance. The demographics and distribution of the Canadian Jewish community do not yield that kind of result.

To be sure, some of the parliamentarians attended the dinner because it was politically expedient to do so. But, to be equally sure, many if not most of the parliamentarians attended the dinner because they wanted to be there, because they believed it was, simply, the right thing to do.

In my view, the attendance of so many MPs and senators showed, at some deeper level of their identity as parliamentarians, that they have a sense of responsibility and affiliation for their fellow democracies.

Speaker after speaker spoke about the common, democratic values that Israel shares with Canada. The presence of so large a contingent of our parliamentarians was the most eloquent proof of it.

Last weekend, noted U.S. political and social commentator Dennis Prager spoke at a Jewish Book Fair event in Toronto. His presentation was typically wide-ranging and forceful. He, too, spoke about Israel and the orientation it shares with the United States to use its democracy to affirm values.

In particular, Prager highlighted that "Jews are obsessed with life." Jews were commanded to "choose life." The covenant at Sinai placed moral demands upon Jews. We were obligated at Sinai to lead a "God-based life," one that differentiates between good and evil.

By contrast, Prager said, "Islamic radicals are obsessed by death. And the struggle between Arabs and Jews is now over values, not over land."

I might have dismissed Prager's assessment of the radical Islamic theology as excessive oratorical flourish had I not earlier in the day read the following passage in an essay by David Remnick in the July 12 issue of the New Yorker:

"The [Muslim] Brotherhood's slogan was, and remains, 'God is our objective; the Koran is our constitution; the prophet is our leader; struggle is our way; and death for the sake of God is the highest of our aspirations.' [italics mine] The Brotherhood, like many groups that bear its imprint decades later – Hamas, Hezbollah [one could also add Al Qaeda, Islamic Jihad, and the government of Iran] – established charitable organizations, clinics, schools, and underground paramilitary groups to further the cause of an Islamic polity."

It should surprise no one, therefore, that governance of any society by Islamic radicals is fundamentally incompatible with the values of democracy, foremost among which is protecting and maintaining the sanctity of human life.

This important point about the relationship between democracy and the sanctity of human life leads, appropriately, to noting the third occasion in which we are stirred to think about democracy's higher truths: Remembrance Day, Nov. 11.

We must always keep this day in our individual and collective hearts.

In a letter to The CJN, Sol Raibmon of Toronto, a veteran of World War II, wrote: "The Jewish community must be made aware of the contribution that Canadians of the Jewish faith made toward the defence of Canada… We must remember those who made the supreme sacrifice, hundreds upon hundreds of whom are buried all over Europe, India, Africa, Burma, Hong Kong, Korea, etc. Their valour… must never be forgotten."

A young student, Brenda Grinsaft, expressed that very same thought in a poem sent to me recently.

"Why do we remember on this day,
Those who fought for us, for our freedom today.
Those who saved us we never knew
They went over seas, in an airplane they flew
Some went by land, some went by sea,
They all went to save you and me…"

In Canada, the United States and Israel, we cherish democracy because we cherish life and those many among us who have died defending democracy.

U.S. Jewish vote moving rightward, rabbi believes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Although voting results were barely in and John Kerry had not yet announced he would concede the U.S. presidential election, Rabbi Abraham Cooper was ready to suggest the 2004 vote marked a dramatic change in the voting patterns of American Jews.

Jewish voters "are shifting to the Republicans," Rabbi Cooper, associate dean of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center, told The CJN during a trip to Toronto last week.

Although he was off in his estimates – Rabbi Cooper said as many as 35 to 40 per cent of Jewish voters had cast their ballots for President George Bush on Nov. 2, while exit polls indicated the figure was closer to 25 per cent – he said the trend is for young Jews and the Orthodox to move toward Republican candidates.

In 2000, Bush received 19 per cent of the Jewish vote, and in 1992, Bush's father, George H.W. Bush, garnered 11 per cent of the Jewish vote.

Rabbi Cooper said a revealing event took place in Boca Raton, Fla., after he addressed a Jewish audience of 250 to 300 people in the weeks leading up to the election. After his talk, 15 members of the audience approached him to say they intended to vote for Bush, but "they didn't want their friends to hear."

Many Jews, he continued, recognize Bush as a steadfast friend of Israel who has declined to prevent Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon from carrying out the policies that he feels best ensures the country's security. Kerry, on the other hand, "did not go out of his way to offer more than lip service for Israel."

Rabbi Abraham Cooper

Rabbi Cooper said he'd been informed by sources close to the Democratic Party that Kerry removed a reference to Israel in the nomination acceptance speech he delivered at the party's summer convention.

Kerry was being sensitive to the views of some young Democratic activists, but in doing so, he sent a signal to many in the Jewish community that helped erode their support for him, the rabbi said.

While Kerry campaigned in Florida by raising concerns about seniors losing their social security, young Jews don't feel as bound by ties to the Democratic Party as their elders, particularly those who remain loyal to the party of Franklin Roosevelt, Rabbi Cooper said. However, many Jews will continue to support the Democratic Party as long as it maintains its liberal social policy agenda, he added.

Nevertheless, Rabbi Cooper believes a change in political allegiance might benefit the Jewish community. "It's not good for Jews to be exclusively in any camp" and be taken for granted by the Democrats, he said.

In drawing closer to the Republican Party and its core base of support, "many American Jewish groups, including us, are more at ease dealing with evangelical Christian groups." Rabbi Cooper acknowledged that many evangelicals would like to convert Jews to Christianity, "but we're confident in our beliefs and happy they support Israel.

"The Jewish community has to seek alliances," he said, noting that Orthodox Jews are also attracted to the traditional values and positions on social issues adopted by Christian groups.

One prominent Jewish figure being wooed by the Republicans for a key role in the next Bush administration is Democratic Senator Joseph Lieberman, he suggested.

Influential commentator William Kristol, editor and publisher of the Weekly Standard, has touted the former vice-presidential candidate as Donald Rumsfeld's replacement as Secretary of Defense, he added.

Turning to the Global Anti-Semitism Forum, a conference in Israel hosted recently by Israel's Minister for Diaspora Affairs Nathan Sharansky, Rabbi Cooper said participants heard that "Islamists" are increasingly referring to Jews in genocidal terms.

He said Islamist radicals around the world are arguing that Jews aren't a legitimate people with a legitimate history and that Israel does not deserve to exist.

France sent a delegation to the conference and Rabbi Cooper believes the French government is belatedly taking steps to address domestic anti-Semitism through tougher policing. "They have gone from seeing anti-Semitism as a way for the Muslim street to blow off steam" to recognizing the danger it poses for France, he said.

However, France's efforts to control radical Islam inside its borders is being conducted "without serious reflection on their Israel policy," he added.

Rabbi Cooper said he planned to travel to South Korea in the near future to investigate claims by a high-level North Korean defector that North Korea now has a functioning gas chamber that it uses against dissidents.

B'nai Brith Canada criticized for official's terror remarks

By RON CSILLAG

Staff Reporter

A leading Canadian Arab group says last week's resignation of a B'nai Brith Canada official over controversial remarks he'd made on a television talk show isn't enough.

Adam Aptowitzer apologized and resigned as Ontario chair of B'nai Brith Canada's Institute for International Affairs for statements he made supporting the use of terror to protect Israel's citizens.

His comments were made on the same Oct. 19 edition of Michael Coren Live as Canadian Islamic Congress president Mohamed Elmasry's notorious remark that all Israeli civilians over the age of 18 are legitimate targets for attack.

Elmasry, who came in for national condemnation, offered his resignation, which was refused by his group.

On the show, which discussed the topic, "What is a Terrorist?" Aptowitzer called terror a "means to an end."

"When Israel uses terror... to destroy a home and convince people to be terrified of what the possible consequences are, I'd say that's acceptable use to terrify someone," he said.

Later in the show, he said: "Israel does make use of – I know I'll be misquoted – but the truth is that terror is an option to be used by states in order to prevent deaths of their own citizens and of others. Acts that take place in Gaza and [the] West Bank, you might want to classify them as terrorists sponsored by the state. But when that is being done to prevent deaths, are we going to say that that is wrong?"

A coalition of three Muslim and Arab groups, CAIR-CAN, the Canadian Arab Federation and the National Council on Canada Arab Relations called on B'nai Brith to "unequivocally repudiate Mr. Aptowitzer's comments and to condemn Israel's use of terror against Palestinian civilians.

"The comments by Mr. Aptowitzer legitimizing Israel's terror tactics against civilians are a violation both of the most basic Canadian human values and international law," the groups said.

Aptowitzer, a lawyer, apologized and resigned the lay position the following day.

But Riad Saloojee, executive director of the Canadian Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR-CAN), said Aptowitzer's resignation is "insufficient."

Terror called a 'means to an end'

"He was speaking as a representative of B'nai Brith Canada and what we really wanted, and asked for, is a statement denouncing Israel's policy of targeting civilians. Does B'nai Brith support Mr. Aptowitzer's [advocacy] of terror as collective punishment?"

In a statement, B'nai Brith said Aptowitzer's remarks "do not reflect the position of B'nai Brith Canada."

And referring to the recent suicide bombing in Tel Aviv, which killed three people and wounded dozens, B'nai Brith reiterated its position that "the measures Israel is forced to take to protect itself against ongoing Palestinian terrorist attacks against its civilians, constitute legitimate self defence and not 'state terrorism.'"

Saloojee said B'nai Brith's statement "never spoke to the issue."

He called it "admirable" that Islamic and Arab groups, including his own, joined Jewish organizations to condemn Elmasry's remarks, and wondered why Aptowitzer's comments did not attract the same widespread outrage.

"It's fair and justified to expect the same opprobrium when Palestinians are targeted. There needs to be universal standards of justice."

Aptowitzer told The CJN that he "misspoke at the end. I certainly did not mean to imply or advocate violence."

And he rejected comparisons between his comments and Elmasry's.

Whereas the Islamic leader "advocated and rationalized" the use of violence, Aptowizter said his comment was meant to mean that the destruction of property "to save innocent lives may be justified."

Saloojee sees a silver lining in the controversy, saying it could bring Jews and Muslims together.

"Maybe it will propel us to more dialogue on this and other issues," he said.

He also said that the Muslim and Arab groups will soon consider how to respond to a recent editorial cartoon in B'nai Brith's in-house publication, the Jewish Tribune.

The cartoon, in the Sept. 15 edition, showed an octopus wearing a keffiyah, a traditional Arabic headdress. Its tentacles were encircling a globe and were holding bombs and a knife.

"It was grotesque and offensive," Saloojee said.

What the Dead Sea Scrolls Tell Us About Ourselves

presented by:

Dr. James Kugel, Starr Professor of Jewish & Hebrew Literature at Harvard University

The Dead Sea Scrolls are the greatest archaeological discovery of modern times and have taught us much about a peculiar group of Jews who lived on the shores of the Dead Sea 2,000 years ago. What we are only beginning to realize is what they can tell us about Judaism today, where it comes from and where it may be headed.

Academic boycott against Israel failing: Chet

Weizmann Institute of Science president visits Toronto

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The international academic boycott targeting Israel is losing momentum, the president of the Weizmann Institute of Science claims.

"It isn't as effective as it was when it began," said Ilan Chet in an interview.

One of the reasons is that many top-flight scientists and Nobel Prize winners have expressed opposition to such boycotts, said Chet, who was in Toronto recently to mark the 40th anniversary of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science.

Another reason the boycott is losing steam is that the Weizmann Institute has fought back, noted Chet, a microbiologist and biologist and the ninth person to hold the presidency since its founding in 1949.

In a letter-writing and e-mail campaign, Weizmann scientists have urged their colleagues abroad to separate politics from science.

At the same time, friends of the institute in the United States have asked members of the U.S. Congress to join in the battle against the boycott.

"We don't see big activity anymore," said Chet. "We don't, for example, see petitions signed by 20, 30 scientists to boycott Israel. People are more careful."

But Chet cautioned that the campaign, which was launched two years ago in Britain by two Jewish professors in reaction to Israel's military response to the second Palestinian uprising, is still a reality.

Israeli scientists are not as likely to be invited to overseas conferences, nor are they asked as often to chair such meetings, he pointed out.

Chet has no statistics to illustrate his impression of what is going on. "But [the boycott is] there," he said. "No question about it."

It converges with a related phenomenon, he explained.

Due to the intifadah, fewer top-ranked scientists are visiting Israel, fearing they may imperil their personal safety.

A day after the interview, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine claimed responsibility for a suicide bombing that killed three Israelis at the Carmel Market in Tel Aviv, the first such attack in more than a month.

Chet, a Hebrew University graduate and an expert in the biological control of soil-borne plant disease, admitted he feels isolated by the drop-off of foreign scientists visiting Israel. "Definitely so."

But he quickly added he does not feel paranoid about it, nor does he believe the boycott is inherently anti-Jewish.

The campaign is weakest in the United States and strongest in France and Britain, he said.

It started in the spring of 2002 when Steven and Hilary Rose called on fellow academics to sever all cultural and research ties with Israel until it abided by United Nations resolutions and the Israeli government entered into serious peace talks with the Palestinians.

The pair circulated a petition, and among the hundreds who signed it were 10 Israelis – two from Hebrew University, three from Haifa University and five from Tel Aviv University.

The main objectives of the boycott are to prevent Israeli academics from obtaining grants; to persuade universities to break relations with Israeli universities and academics; to convince academics to stay away from Israel; and to bar publication of scholarly articles written by Israelis.

Ilan Chet

In addition, the boycott promotes divestment from Israel.

Chet voiced regret that Jewish and Israeli academics, all left-wing, have jumped on the boycott bandwagon.

And he waved aside a recent call by Palestinian academics from Birzeit University in the West Bank to boycott Israeli universities.

The statement, issued last July, claimed that the "Israeli academy has contributed, either directly or indirectly, to maintaining, defending or otherwise justifying the military occupation and colonization of the West Bank and Gaza."

Chet countered that "the Israeli academy is not involved in the occupation and politics. We've worked with Palestinian academics."

But he added that the Weizmann Institute, which has an enrolment of approximately 900, currently has few Palestinian students.

An Israel Prize recipient who has worked in Egypt, he conceded that Israel's academic relations with Egypt and Jordan have been "very limited" since the outbreak of the second intifadah.

But on an upbeat note, he said the institute maintains its high standards, continues to stimulate inter-disciplinary research and has a staff of top-notch scientists, several of whom deserve Nobel Prizes, he believes.

He also attempted to take over south Lebanon, a move that led to the Israeli incursion there in 1982 and his subsequent expulsion to Tunisia, where he lived, a leader-in-exile, plotting death and destruction for Jews. He never deviated. Until 1993, when he came to the White House to sign the accord with Israel that was intended to bring peace between Palestinians and Israelis.

"Now, as we stand on the threshold of this new historic era," Arafat told the world from the east lawn of the White House on Sept. 13, 1993, "let me address the people of Israel and their leaders… We will need more courage and determination to continue the course of building coexistence and peace between us.This is possible. And it will happen with mutual determination and with the effort that will be made with all parties on all the tracks to establish the foundations of a just and comprehensive peace."

But Arafat lied. His handshake with then-Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, it turned out, alas, was a ruse.

Fifteen months later in accepting the Nobel Peace Prize in Oslo, Arafat said: "I know full well, Mr. Chairman, that this supreme and greatly significant prize was not awarded to me and to my partners… to crown an achievement: but as an encouragement to pursue a route with greater steps and deeper awareness, with truer intentions so that we may transform the peace option, the peace of the brave, from words into practice and reality… Just as war is a great adventure, peace is a challenge and wager. If we fail to endow peace with the wherewithal to withstand the tempest amid the storm, if we fail to nurture peace so that it may gain in strength, if we fail to give it scope to grow and gain in strength, the wager could be wasted and lost…

"I call on all the countries of the world, especially the donor countries, to speed up their contributions so that the Palestinian people may overcome their economic and social problems and proceed with reconstruction and the rebuilding of infrastructures… We view peace as a historic strategic option, not a tactical one directed by current calculations of gain or loss. The peace process is not only a political process, it is an integrated operation where national awareness, economic, scientific and technological development play a major role, just as cultural, social and creative merging play essential roles that are of the very essence of the peace process and fortify it."

He lied again, as he did throughout his life from rostrums and podiums on every continent. Finally, U.S. President George W. Bush caught him out on his lies with the Karine-A gun-running ship affair.

Arafat stole billions of dollars from his own people. He brought death to countless Jews, Arabs and others. He radicalized an entire generation of young Palestinians to hate the Jewish state. And he built nothing.

Ultimately, the truth will show he cared less to found a Palestinian homeland than he did to destroy the Jewish one. He cared less to build a new Palestinian society than he did to tear down the Israeli one.

Yasser Arafat could have proclaimed an end to the state of war with Israel; he could have founded the Palestinian state and laid the building blocks for a new Palestinian society. But he chose not to.

That is the unburnished truth of Yasser Arafat's life.

No response to tuition crisis

Baila Lubek, chair of the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, unfairly vents her rage (Letters, Nov. 4) at a CJN article for citing anecdotal evidence that simply substantiates what the community has known for years.

Declining enrolment, increasing tuition fees and the deterioration of the quality of education delivered by our schools have become the order of the day. Yet, Lubek prefers to cite the oft-quoted myth that the $7.8 million dedicated by the UJA to Jewish education is a "point of pride in our community."

While Lubek denigrates the "anecdotal evidence" (yet provides no evidence to the contrary), middle-class parents continue to face the untenable choice of either paying exorbitant tuition fees or pulling their children out of the system.

Her oft-repeated assertion that the BJE is labouring to find "additional funds and other funding options to further reduce the tuition load" is an empty promise that has yet to bear any fruit.

In the meantime, this community has failed to acknowledge the crisis in Jewish education today and the toll it has taken on several thousand parents. All the corrections, clarifications and letters to the editor combined cannot deny this unfortunate reality.

Marathoner's mother very much alive

The article "Toronto Marathon attracts more than 10,000 runners" (CJN, Oct. 28) inadvertently created the impression in the closing line that I may have died.

While I want to thank The CJN for your interest and coverage of the marathon, rumours of my demise have been greatly exaggerated – and have resulted in some interesting calls to my friends and family.

If you could find the time to print a note that I am alive and well, it would be much appreciated.

Refreshed as Jews

My husband and I recently returned from our annual trip to Israel. What a delightful holiday. Yes, we vacation in Florida, Europe, the Caribbean and elsewhere, but nowhere do we enjoy ourselves as much as we do in Israel.

We stayed at a hotel on the beach in Tel Aviv. We swam every day in the sea. We walked to Jaffa regularly for exercise and had lunch daily in a seaside bistro. We shopped and found Israeli fashion more stylish than in Paris or New York. Dining was amazing in the old part of Tel Aviv, which is being totally made over with fine bistros and restaurants. We rented a car and drove north to Herzliyah, where we had a delightful lunch. The shopping plazas made the Eaton Centre look Third World.

We drove to Jerusalem and visited the Western Wall. Nothing can compare to the emotions we felt in a place where you can relate to God and experience the depth of Judaism. There were some Canadians visiting, but too few. Yes, there were security measures at all coffee shops, stores, etc., but that made us feel more secure.

We implore your readers to vacation in Israel. The Israelis were so happy with us and made us feel so welcome. It was Sukkot and we were invited by friends to dine in a sukkah.

We visited the Chaim Sheba Medical Centre and were amazed by the high-tech approach to medicine. We had breakfast with former Israeli prime minister and Nobel Peace Prize- winner Shimon Peres, who always impresses us greatly.

Our visit to an Israeli air base was perhaps the highlight of our trip. We saw F-15 fighters and were told by a 23-year-old pilot that Israeli technology was installed to replace original U.S. equipment and that the technology is now being sold to the Americans. We are so proud of the Israeli Defence Forces, whose members are no longer foot soldiers, but "brain soldiers."

We were the crowds at the beaches, markets and restaurants. The Israelis live their lives under difficult conditions but never complain or lose their zest for life. Their courage and spirit are awesome.

Each time we go, we come back refreshed as Jews and as human beings.

I can assure you that we will be in Jerusalem again next year!

Failure to minimize innocent loss of life

David Bronfman berates The CJN for "reinforcing several well-entrenched myths, falsehoods and slanders" about the current intifadah (Letters, CJN, Oct. 21). However, he adds a few of his own.

In 18 months, from Sept. 29, 2000, (the date of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount) to March 26, 2002, (Erev Pesach was March 27), B'Tselem, the Israeli human rights organization, recorded the deaths of 1,083 Palestinians at the hands of Israeli security forces and civilians. Of these, 196 were aged 17 or younger. During the same period, they record 342 Israeli deaths (civilians and security forces), of which 47 were under 18. If this is not "reacting harshly," then I don't understand English.

Over the entire period up to Sept. 30, 2004, B'Tselem recorded 2,936 Palestinian deaths (580 were under 18 and 469 under 17). During the same time, there were 925 Israelis killed (112 under 18 and 94 under 17). While the loss of life on both sides of this conflict has been horrendous, it's clear to me that Israel has failed to "minimize innocent loss of life," especially as related to the killing of minors.

Will Bush change course on Israel?

Israeli officials delight in Bush win, but wonder about future directions

By LESLIE SUSSER

The Israeli establishment is delighted by the re-election of President George W. Bush. His Democratic challenger, Senator John Kerry, is seen as a good friend of Israel, but Israeli officials speak of an ideological meeting of minds between Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Likud-led government and Bush's neoconservative-dominated milieu.

Both place a premium on the war against terror and the creation of democratic institutions as a means to achieve world and regional peace.

Moreover, as president, Bush's record on Israel is seen as impeccable, and there was some anxiety that, if elected, Kerry might have been inclined to follow a more co-ordinated international policy that would ultimately put pressure on Israel to make concessions on the Palestinian track.

But there are concerns about pressure on Israel from a second Bush administration, too. Some suggest that Bush may seek improved ties with Europe, and that this could put new demands on Israel.

Israeli officials hold that Bush's overall worldview, dividing the world into good and evil protagonists, allies and enemies, with Israel on the side of the steadfast allies, is a huge bonus.

Kerry would probably have been more inclined to turn to the international community and international institutions – the United Nations and the International Court of Justice at the Hague – to resolve global problems. And that, the officials maintain, might have been detrimental to Israeli interests.

They also make much of Bush's letter to Sharon last April, in which they see a significant upgrading of the strategic understanding between Israel and the United States on the Palestinian issue.

The letter underscores agreement that the Palestinians would not have the right to return to Israel itself in a final peace settlement, that Israel would be able to keep large settlement blocs in the West Bank, and that the United States would not support any international peace plan other than the "road map" to peace, which both Israel and the Palestinians have approved.

In addition, they say, Bush, who refused to have anything to do with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat because of his perceived implication in Palestinian terror, would be less likely to deal with his successors unless they carry out road map reforms.

Kerry, if elected, they believe, might not have stuck to the road map or to its demands for Palestinian reform.

Still, there is a mainstream assessment in the Israeli Foreign Ministry that American policy on the Israeli-Palestinian issue, even under Bush, will be become more proactive and more closely co-ordinated with Europe.

A ministry position paper warns of a possible American deal with Europe over Iraq and Iran, in which Israeli concessions to the Palestinians would be the payoff for European support for Washington in Iraq and the Gulf.

There are two schools of thought on a new Bush administration in the Foreign Ministry: one expects more of the same, with Bush feeling that he now has an overwhelming mandate from the American people to continue the war on terror, as well as his policies in Iraq and on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, no matter what the Europeans think.

The opposing view holds that Bush's first order of business will be to start cleaning up the mess in Iraq, and that he will need European and Arab support.

"He won't go to them cap in hand," an official told JTA. "But he will be ready to co-ordinate moves with them on the Israeli-Palestinian issue in return."

What this will mean on the ground, the official said, is American insistence that immediately after its planned withdrawal from Gaza and part of the West Bank next summer, Israel must be ready to enter into negotiations with the Palestinians, based on the road map, with the Europeans playing a key role.

"Bush," said the official, who asked not to be identified, "will want to see his two-state vision, Israel and Palestine side by side, implemented before he completes his second term."

But, the official added, much will depend on the Palestinians.

Bush will only push for progress if the violence stops. Otherwise, he will give Israel the same unlimited backing in its fight against terror that he has given for the past three years.

On the other hand, if a new Palestinian leadership, with Arafat ill and out of the picture, does make a serious effort to curb terror, Bush, in his second term, will want to see more from Israel, the official said.

He won't pressure Israel in a crude way, but he will ask "that it help the U.S. by making moves that go down well in Europe and the Arab world."

Labor leader Shimon Peres makes a similar argument, but sees in it a positive light. He says the next major challenge America will face will be Iran and its drive for nuclear weapons.

After two wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, the United States will not be in a position to launch a third. Therefore, Peres reasons, it will need international – especially European – co-operation to contain Iran through the imposition of sanctions. This, he says, will probably lead to a Middle East package – a new U.S.-backed European initiative on Israel and the Palestinians, in return for European support on Iraq and Iran.

In some government circles, there is a fear that this could lead to pressure that Israel will be bound to resist. But Peres sees it as a welcome development. He says three major changes are coming to fruition at the same historical moment and could lead to a long overdue breakthrough on the Israeli-Palestinian track: the Israeli government's readiness to withdraw from Gaza and part of the West Bank, a Palestinian readiness to be more pragmatic, and Europe and the United States' readiness to play a more active role.

Peres hopes that Bush, in his second term, may be ready to risk more than he did first time around to stabilize the Middle East as a whole. And he is convinced that this need not lead to a showdown with Israel.

The Foreign Ministry officials, who foresee a more proactive American policy, agree – on the condition that the Israeli government continues to co-ordinate all its moves as closely as possible with the newly elected American administration.

Traumatized but resilient

In a city as old as Jerusalem, changes within the span of a year or two seem so subtle that they are hardly noticed. But while short-term transitions may be mundane for Jerusalemites, they are strikingly more obvious to those revisiting the city after an absence of several months.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

What immediately attracts attention is the emerging security barrier – part fence, part wall – that now snakes across the hills beyond the perimeter of the Old City. Still unfinished, this much-publicized structure looms as a powerful symbol of a new reality that will likely have an enduring impact not only on those who live in its shadow, but also on the broader Israeli population that lives far from its path.

And while the barrier is intended to add protection to Israel's borders with the territories, it is also apparent that security arrangements within cities, though always tight since the outbreak of the intifadah, have become even tighter. On a visit to Jerusalem last month, my wife and I joined our daughter and two of her friends – all students at Hebrew University – for dinner in the German Colony neighbourhood. The restaurant we selected, like others in the vicinity, was guarded and gated, and a police vehicle was parked a few short metres away. The food bill included an extra charge – for security. Just one year ago, there was a terrorist bombing at a nearby coffee shop on the same street.

On the day after our restaurant visit, my wife and I went to Mount Scopus, first to do the mandatory parental inspection of Ilana's dorm room and then to tour the magnificent Hebrew University campus. Entering the university grounds required proof of identity, a bag search and passage through an x-ray machine. So even there, at this renowned bastion of learning, liberalism and enlightenment, the concern about security is very much in evidence. And with good reason.

In the summer of 2002, nine young people, five of them non-Israelis, were killed when a bomb went off in the university's crowded cafeteria. Hamas proudly claimed responsibility for the blast, which was so powerful that it caused the building's ceiling to collapse.

A poignant memorial to the victims now stands outside the rebuilt facility. It is a tree that stands at an angle with its roots showing. When once asked about its symbolism, university president Menachem Magidor responded in this way: "Our roots were shaken, but just like the tree, we keep growing and going forward."

His words have great resonance, not only in soothing the wounds of his campus, but also in expressing the resilience of a Jerusalem that has endured more than its share of trauma in recent years.

The earthly versus the heavenly Jerusalem

I once guided a U.S. congressman around Jerusalem. A devout, evangelical Christian, he was breathless with excitement when, early in the morning, we ascended the Mount of Olives for a first view of the Holy City. As he peered off into the hazy distance, something caught his attention. I realized, to my embarrassment, that it was the massive accumulation of broken bottles, discarded household appliances, rusting car bodies and other assorted rubbish that tumbles down the slope beneath the Arab neighbourhood of Silwan. But the slanting rays of a low sun gave the unsightly heap a beautiful golden sheen.

Rosy Culiner in Jerusalem

"Get a look at that, will you! What a heavenly sight!" the congressman warbled rhapsodically, barely able to contain his emotions, "I'll be darned if it isn't a golden brook rushing down the mountain of God! This is absolutely the most gorgeous city in the whole wide world!"

In one form or another, these sorts of visions are a regular occurrence here. When it comes to Jerusalem, imagination is constantly getting the better of our sense of reality. I have lived in this mysterious city long enough to know that just about everybody conjures up his or her own idealized version of it. As a place that is so rarely visited and so frequently and intensely contemplated, and as a permanent fixture of our inner spiritual and religious lives, its natural home has always been in the land of illusion, delusion and dreams.

Ancient Jewish sages, aware of the slippery duality of Jerusalem, postulated two distinct and separate cities. There was the humdrum earthly Jerusalem – that largely rundown, dirty, neglected, littered, congested, poor, smelly and noisy place that I live in. But there was also the heavenly Jerusalem, up nearer to God, the sublimely perfect sort of Holy City we would all like it to be.

Today, no less than ever, the two Jerusalems continue their parallel, yet separate, existences. People continue to mix them up in their heads and in their hearts, substituting the heavenly attributes of the one for the earthly realities of the other. This can have charming consequences, as when we alchemize garbage into gold. But it can also result in serious miscalculations.

We Jews are as susceptible as anyone to the seductions of wishful thinking. As we gaze out from the luxurious comfort of our rooms in the King David Hotel and marvel at the regal splendour of the mighty ramparts and ancient skyline beyond, we are confident of our permanent place and role in our beloved city.

Yet, I can't help but wonder how many of us are fully aware of how precious little of what we see and take great pride in bears connection to Jews, Judaism, and Jewish workmanship, craftsmanship or history. Indeed, in their present state, the more ancient districts of Jerusalem are – in inspiration, architecture, construction, population and prevailing mood – largely Islamic or Christian. Even the famed Tower of David, the noble landmark opposite our hotel windows, is a Muslim shrine that shares nothing with the illustrious Jewish monarch of antiquity except its name. In short, we Jews are often the least conspicuous, and probably least significant, presence in much of the historical heartland of what we so readily declare to be "our" city.

But that doesn't stop us from making bold proclamations such as, "Jerusalem, the undivided, eternal capital of the Jewish people and the State of Israel, forever and ever!" We would be wise, I believe, to stop confusing the two Jerusalems. Sober observation, uncoloured by illusions, quickly reveals that today, one-third of the earthbound city's population is Palestinian – Muslims and, to a lesser extent, Christians – and that this number is steadily growing, not diminishing.

Not surprisingly, the Palestinians have their own heavenly Jerusalem, one that is radically different from ours. But only a judicious convergence of, and compromise between, our disparate heavens will hold any promise of coexistence in the foreseeable future. Only then will we be able to go on living and dreaming in the one and only earthly Jerusalem that there is.

Arafat's curtain call

When Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat was carried from the ruins of his headquarters in Ramallah and loaded onto a Jordanian military helicopter, there were as many journalists as Palestinians in the crowd that came to see him off. Another media flock gathered in Paris to cover his arrival at a military hospital and give credence to every rumour and bit of Palestinian spin. Indeed, in addition to his major contributions to terrorism and murder, Arafat's greatest accomplishments have been as a public relations flack.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

These talents were already visible during his days as a student in Cairo, where he invented an impressive biography (including the fiction that he was born in Jerusalem). He gave himself the nom de guerre of Abdel-Rahman Abdel-Raouf Arafat al-Qudwa al-Husseini – choosing "al-Husseini" to claim a link to the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, who worked closely with the Nazis, and to the leader of the Palestinian forces that fought (and lost) to the nascent Israeli army in the 1947-1948 war.

He also selected "Arafat" – a site related to the pilgrimage in Mecca – in order to appeal to the wider Muslim world. Although Fatah and the PLO are advertised as secular nationalist groups, Arafat has been a master at manipulating Islamic symbols. His speeches have often begun with words from the Qu'ran, and over the years, he has managed to transform Jerusalem into the near-equivalent of Mecca and Medina.

After the Arabs' ignominious defeat in the 1967 war, he presented himself as a modern Saladin, and as Nasser's successor as the Arab and Islamic world's charismatic leader. Jet-setting around the world, Arafat found the Palestinian stage too inconsequential. By terrorizing friend and foe, Arafat gained power and attention for himself and the cause he claimed to represent.

Under his guidance, terror groups hijacked airplanes and conducted numerous outrages, including the massacre at the 1972 Munich Olympics. The notoriety he gained in the process also brought the PLO leader, with his trademark keffiyah and pistol, into Europe's radical chic salons and the headquarters of the United Nations.

But Arafat's image as a clever strategist was highly inflated, and his failures offset his achievements. In 1970, after a failed attempt to take control in Jordan, he fled to Beirut, where the PLO's presence helped to trigger the bitter Lebanese civil war. In 1982, terror attacks from Lebanon goaded then Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin and his defence minister Ariel Sharon into launching a full-scale invasion, and the Palestinian leader and his inner circle fled once again, this time to Tunis. But the scale of the attacks and his successful defiance helped to solidify the image of Palestinian victimization, and accelerate the diplomatic isolation of Israel.

Arafat's faulty judgment was also displayed after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in 1990, when he rushed to Baghdad and embraced Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein. A few months later, Saddam was defeated, Palestinians had been expelled from Kuwait, and donations to the PLO, which Arafat funnelled into his personal accounts and used to ensure the loyalty of Fatah warlords, dried up. As a result, in Gaza, Ramallah and elsewhere, Palestinians who were not part of the Tunisian circle began to compete for power.

On the ropes again, Arafat sent some of his closest advisors to talk to Israelis eager to reach a peace agreement, and in 1993, these contacts solidified into the Oslo process and the signing ceremony at the White House. A few months later, Arafat's motorcade arrived triumphantly in Gaza, and he took control of the Palestinian Authority.

But instead of building a stable Palestinian state alongside Israel, Arafat's corruption and terror remained dominant, while the Oslo process stalled and then collapsed in a spasm of catastrophic violence. During this period, Arafat constantly set the tone for the incitement and rejectionism that fuels terror attacks, regularly calling for "a million martyrs to march on Jerusalem."

After the PR campaign fades, Arafat will be remembered for the chaos and unprecedented brutality that he brought to Israelis and Palestinians.

In preparing for the post-Arafat era, there are no precedents or clues regarding succession – he never had an understudy. The new Palestinian leadership will face a formidable challenge in reversing his legacy of terror and moving towards a more hopeful future.

The Kirshner File

South Africa grist for Slovo's literary mill

It's hardly surprising that practically half of Gillian Slovo's books – four out of 10 – are set in South Africa, her native land, and unfold against the backdrop of political upheaval and transformation.

South Africa, which lifted itself from the depths of apartheid to the heights of multiracial democracy in a peaceful transition that culminated with the election of Nelson Mandela as president in 1994, is grist for her literary mill.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Here recently to read from her latest novel, Ice Road, at the International Festival of Authors, Slovo is fascinated by South Africa's startling metamorphosis.

In novels such as Red Dust, The Betrayal and Facade, she describes the political and social dimensions of apartheid – the repressive system of racial separation and institutionalized segregation – and chronicles the ultimate resiliency of its victims.

Yet Slovo, a former journalist whose first novel was published two decades ago, is not merely a detached observer. She writes from the heart, from searing personal experience.

Her late parents, Joe Slovo and Ruth First, were lifelong communists, anti-apartheid activists and members of the African National Congress, which spearheaded the arduous struggle against apartheid. But they paid a heavy price for their militancy. Under the Suppression of Communism Act, they could neither be quoted in the media nor attend public gatherings. And both endured periods of imprisonment.

With the virtual disintegration of apartheid, Joe Slovo returned to South Africa from exile in Britain, where he and his family had fled in 1964. In post-apartheid South Africa, he was an honoured figure and the minister of housing in Mandela's government. In 1995, at the age of 68, he died after a protracted battle with cancer.

First's parents were among the founders of South Africa's Communist party, which was banned by the apartheid-era government. She edited African National Congress periodicals ranging from The Guardian to Fighting Talk. In 1979, she was appointed director of research at the Centre for African Studies in Maputo, Mozambique, where she was assassinated in 1982 by South African agents.

Six years ago, Slovo, 52, wrote an account of her childhood in South Africa and her relationship with her parents. The memoir was titled Every Secret Thing: My Family, My Country.

Slovo, who calls contemporary South Africa "an amazingly alive society," resides in London with her husband, psychotherapist Andy Metcalf, and their teenage daughter. She has lived in Britain for the past 40 years, since her parents' decision to leave the country that hounded and persecuted them.

Slovo's memories of the old South Africa, where she spent the first 12 years of her life, remain vivid but largely negative.

She recalls happy holidays in Cape Town. But she also remembers dogs regularly barking at black pedestrians and black household workers having to use the backdoor entrance. More poignantly, she recoils at the memory of a black paperboy hit by a car near her home and callously left to die on the road.

In the final analysis, the plight of her parents, dramatically portrayed in the 1987 Hollywood film A World Apart, colours her impressions of South Africa.

Their all-consuming preoccupation with politics, as well as their brushes with the authorities, placed a strain on her childhood. "I loved my parents and I'm extremely proud of what they did and what they stood for, but these memories of my father's disappearance and my mother's imprisonment stick in my mind. I'm over that now and pleased to have been one of their children."

She and her two sisters, Shawn and Robyn, both of whom are in the film industry and live in Britain, were brought up in a secular milieu where social justice mattered and was never taken for granted.

The Slovos regarded apartheid as an intrinsic evil, and her father fervently believed that it was doomed to wither and die. From 1948, the year the xenophobic National party seized power, he kept predicting that apartheid could not possibly last another five years.

"What was going on was wrong," she said. But her classmates led blinkered lives, their eyes closed to a system that discriminated against blacks, coloureds and Asians.

Some Jews in South Africa, a minority, opposed apartheid and thus acquitted themselves honourably. "They risked their lives to fight it." Indeed, the bulk of apartheid's white adversaries were Jews, Slovo observed.

But the majority of Jews accepted it as an immutable reality and reaped its benefits, she added. Slovo has contempt for Jews who were sensitive to anti-Semitism but could not understand someone else's oppression.

Model egalitarians, her parents lived by the classic principle of Judaism, justice, and yearned for the moment when all South Africans, regardless of the colour of their complexion, would be equal under the law.

Slovo is not as political as her parents, probably because she was not exposed to apartheid as an adult. "But I do have a strong sense of social justice."

She joined the African National Congress in 1982 and participated in anti-apartheid demonstrations and in divestment campaigns. "I thought apartheid couldn't go on forever. But I never thought South Africa would make a non-violent transition to democracy."

Slovo, whose first book was the detective novel Morbid Symptoms, went back to South Africa in 1990 following Mandela's release from prison. Her father, a lawyer by profession, returned in the same year to take part in historic talks with the apartheid government.

Gillian Slovo

Since then, she has been back on annual visits. But she doubts whether she would ever live there on a permanent basis. "I love South Africa, but I'm in England to stay." In 1994, however, she spent about a year in South Africa researching Every Secret Thing and tending to her father, who was quite sick.

Prior to her father's death, Israel's ambassador to South Africa arranged for a long-lost Israeli relative to visit him in hospital. "That was rather wonderful."

But till his dying breath, the Lithuanian-born, Yiddish-speaking activist was an anti-Zionist. "He thought no one had a right to uproot a people – the Palestinians – and take someone else's land."

She generally agrees with his views on Israel, but Slovo's pragmatic streak definitely sets her apart from him. As she put it: "Israel does exist, and there has to be a settlement that accommodates both sides."

Slovo, though, nurses bitterness concerning Israel's close relationship with the old South Africa. "It was a shocking and shoddy one."

The new South Africa impresses Slovo.

"They did it, they changed their world for the better."

But a decade after South Africa's first interracial election, apartheid has yet to be completely interred. "People have begun to realize that it'll take a long time to overturn the legacy of apartheid."

For all its strides since the dissolution of apartheid, South Africa is still dogged by gross economic disparities along race lines, with poverty trapping mainly non-whites. "There's a rising black middle-class," she said. "But most blacks are extremely poor."

In addition, Slovo is upset by the disastrous incidence of the HIV virus and its deadly twin, AIDS, in South Africa.

"A whole generation is being decimated."

Whites are gradually becoming accustomed to South Africa's new political order, and colour consciousness is on the decline. "But it's difficult for some whites. Those who are resistant to change have left the country."

Slovo's newest book, Ice Road, which was shortlisted for the 2004 Orange Prize, marks something of a departure for Slovo.

Exploring an Arctic winter in Stalin's Soviet Union in 1933, the novel takes place in Leningrad (St. Petersburg), and turns on family ties, love and loyalty tested to the limit by communism.

"I didn't want to write about South Africa again," said Slovo, who researched the novel in Russia and a historical library in London. "I wanted a big landscape and a plot about people surviving tyranny. It seemed like a very good subject."

In a roundabout way, Ice Road, written in Slovo's usual spare, kinetic style, summons up themes present in her novels about South Africa.

But who can be surprised? South Africa runs deep in her blood.

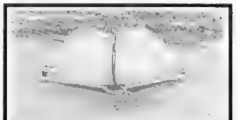
Prayer – a pathway to reflection

By RABBI DAVID CADOCH



We live in a time of tremendous stress and anxiety.

Most of our energies are focused on earning a living, while ensuring a stable family environment. There are also the demands of our professional responsibilities, the obligations toward our spouse, children, friends and colleagues. Our lifestyle is a constant rush from one event to another. Even our diets have become so artificial, that we fool ourselves in believing we are eating healthy foods when they are soya-based derivatives and fresh fruits and vegetables grown by questionable methods and practices.

Is it ever a wonder at the increasing life-threatening diseases of our time – heart disease, stroke and various forms of cancer? (May the Almighty keep us from these silent killers.) The medical profession is quick to warn us of the dangers of stress factors in our lives.

So what can we do about it? Is there a way to curb the dangerous direction of our lifestyle?

Rabbi Elazar Ha-Kapar said: "Envy (jealousy), insatiable longings and thirst for honour remove a person from this world" (Mishnah Avot 4:28).

From a superficial analysis, one can understand the obvious negative implications of envy, greed and thirst for honour. Yet they might be seen as catalysts to achieve personal success. The real question should be – at what cost? What is the true cost of following this recipe for material and personal success?

Our sages warn us that these negative character traits will cost us our very lives. The very nature of these traits generates negative energy that will have damaging psychological consequences and will eventually lead to pathological disorders.

What remedy can we harness to offset this imbalance? What seems to be happening in our society is the constant "rush"– not taking the time for clear thinking, not taking time for eating properly and not devoting time to our spouse and children, who need our whole presence, not merely clusters of divided attention. (In our society, this is one of the major causes of divorce.) We are lacking the ability to contemplate our raison d'être.

Our sages recognized the importance of a balanced relationship between our spiritual and physical needs. Hence they devised a systematic prayer cycle that would serve this end. Prayer in Hebrew is "tfillah," the verb to pray is hitpallel (the reflexive form). In other words, the act of praying is according to our sages an act of self-judgment.

As Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsh zt"l writes: "Tfillah is a step out of active life in order to attempt to gain a true judgment of oneself, that is about one's ego, about one's relationship to God and the world, and of God and the world to oneself. It strives to infuse mind and heart with the power of such judgment as will direct both anew to active life – purified, sublimated and strengthened."

All of this is summed up in one word at the creation chapter of the Torah. When Adam and Chavah had tasted of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, the Torah describes the event:

"And the eyes of both of them were opened... And they heard the voice of God withdrawing itself into the garden in the cool of the day, and Adam and his wife hid themselves from the Presence of God amongst the tree... Then God called Adam and said unto him: Where are you? Ayecah?" (Gen. 3: 7-10). Where are we at with regards to one's ego, one's relationship to God and the world, and of God and the world to oneself?

Tfillah is a time for profound personal reflection of our lives, and where we stand. It is a time to ask why we suffer and why we hurt. It is a time for deep soul-searching, to nurture spiritual strength by correcting our negative character traits and aligning our moral fibre with Torah values. We must search to reclaim our peace of mind, which is the true gift from the Almighty. Peace of mind is a byproduct of integrity and profound bitachon (trust) in HaShem. The pathway to this soul-searching process is tfillah. May we all pray for guidance and peace of mind.

Rabbi David Cadoch is a talmid of HaGaon HaRav Leib Baron of Montreal, and a chaver of the Rabbinical Council of Canada and the Rabbinical Council of America.

Between absolutism and relativism

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Often my students and I are challenged by how to apply ethics in the real world. We once read a story written by a supermodel named Waris Dirie. Like more than 100 million other girls in Central Africa, Dirie was forced at a very young age by her parents to undergo female genital mutilation. Infection and disease are common, and a substantial number of the girls eventually die from it.

My adolescent charges, many of whom had anxiety about things like what to wear at the prom and what university they would attend, were forced to consider what many Western governments are confronted by – do you intervene in places that, strictly speaking, are "none of your business?"

After explaining that this was a time-honoured, if patriarchal, cultural ritual for many of these tribes, I put it to my 17-year-olds bluntly: "If the only way you could prevent this from happening was by force, even at the barrel of a gun, would you stop the practice of clitoridectomy? Would you impose your values on another culture?"

By and large, their answer was "no." We would try to persuade them, educate them regarding the medical disaster that was ensuing, and argue with them about why it must stop. I considered the poignant rationality built into the verbs they were using: "educate," "persuade," and "argue." Morality is definitely a conversation, a dialogue between interested parties. My students' optimism regarding the power of such discourse reminded me of Immanuel Kant's famous maxim: "Reason binds man to man" – as circular a formula as there ever was. Which people are bound to each other? Essentially those whose conception of reason is similar, if not identical. Would Kant simply dismiss clitoridectomy as the product of irrationality and leave it at that?

But finally, the dilemma is, as always, to what avenues do our moral conclusions lead us? This is not at all an easy question to answer, lying as it does between the twin rocky ledges of tyrannical absolutism and often impotent relativism. Would Waris Dirie and millions of other traumatized African girls be grateful to her potential military rescuers, or would they tell them to mind their own business and let Africans carry out their own carnage? Do people want to be saved by others, even by coercive methods?

Of course, since Sept. 11, 2001, there is a new two-word shorthand that is used to slam religion as being the province of deadly absolutism: bin Laden. What has occurred even more emphatically than before in the wake of that horrible day is that all claims to truth are now tidily characterized as "fundamentalism." Although critics are careful to delineate between fundamentalist violence and those who simply cling to what they see as true, the distinction quickly collapses and the real agenda emerges. All those who feel they possess a truth are suspect and indeed just a little dangerous, as though under the ideological rock of every right-wing minister or rabbi, bin Laden waits to emerge.

But as we know, life is far more complex. Although religious figures of all kinds must sometimes answer for defaming God's glory on earth, the solution, more than ever before, is not to dismiss religion but to renew it. We owe our students at least that much.

Jewish Life

Lansky helped foster a Yiddish renaissance

Outwitting History: The Amazing Adventures of a Man Who Rescued a Million Yiddish Books by Aaron Lansky, Algonquin Books of Chapel Hill.

Books
Bernard Baskin

There is something indefinably special about Yiddish. The Ukrainian chassidic master, Nahmen of Bratslav (1772-1811), urged his followers to speak daily to God in their native Yiddish rather than Hebrew, a language they were not accustomed to speaking. He wrote, "In the Yiddish we use for ordinary conversation, it is easier to break one's heart."

Yiddish is not a language that one studies, but rather absorbs. Mamaloshen (mother tongue) is the homely phrase for it and suggests the warmth of the home, the love of the mother and the flavour of a mother's tears.

Yiddish emerged about 1,000 years ago in central Europe as a form of medieval German with an admixture of Hebrew words. As Jews gradually moved into eastern Europe, they carried this colourful, flexible, usable language with them.

It is estimated that before World War II, eight to 11 million persons, or about three-quarters of the world's Jewish population, claimed Yiddish as their first or only language. More than half of the world's Yiddish speakers perished in the Holocaust.

When Jews migrated to countries where they were granted equal rights, they usually spoke Yiddish in the first generation and then decreasingly in the second and third. In the 1920s, Yiddish newspapers published in New York sold more than 200,000 copies every day. Although fewer than 250,000 Yiddish-speaking Jews remain in North America, the language is gaining new popularity among young people. Yiddish courses are now offered at scores of colleges and universities around the world.

Outwitting History is the astonishing account of how an imaginative, persuasive, determined and hardworking young American rescued more than a million and a half Yiddish books in North America and the once-thriving Jewish communities of Europe.

About 25 years ago, Aaron Lansky became aware that Yiddish books were being abandoned everywhere. Older Yiddish readers died and their children often discarded the inherited books or relegated them to some remote nook in either attic or basement.

With the help of eager volunteers, Lansky set out to rescue these books from oblivion. Outwitting History is a lively, engaging, often moving, and sometimes humorous account, of how these books were salvaged and given a new life.

With implicit trust in dilapidated rental trucks and a few eager cohorts, Lansky started on his book-collecting adventures. The elderly Jews who he encountered were from a forgotten time. As a book reviewer wrote, "They regaled him with stories of labour unions, leftist politics and the once-vibrant Yiddish culture. Every book pickup became a lesson in personal history, usually accompanied by an artery-clogging meal."

In Canada, Lansky had some difficult moments in convincing puzzled custom officials that the truck piled with used books had no commercial value. In time, the tireless Lansky created the National Yiddish Book Center in Amherst, Mass., a splendidly commodious structure to house the ever-growing collection. The centre has created special programming, translated Yiddish titles into English, enlisted filmmaker Steven Spielberg to digitize the entire collection and helped foster a Yiddish renaissance in North America.

Isaac Bashevis Singer, winner of the Nobel Prize in literature for his Yiddish output, predicted that his beloved Yiddish had not yet said its final word. If it still speaks to us, then much of the credit devolves on Lansky, who has outwitted history's attempt to make this unique language only a memory.

Jewish comic books, Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Superman, Spider-Man, Alfred E. Neuman. They are some of the most enduring and powerful characters in popular culture. And they all have Jewish roots.

Thanks to Jack Kirby (Fantastic Four), Will Eisner (The Spirit), Joe Kubert (Ragman), Art Spiegelman (Maus) and many others, the face of comic book publishing has had a Jewish flavour since comics books first appeared seven decades ago.

In his impressive three-part series in Reform Judaism magazine, "How the Jews Created the Comic Book Industry," Arie Kaplan traces the giants (and lesser-knowns) of the industry from 1933 to the present. He begins with the story of an unemployed Jewish novelty salesman named Max Gaines (formerly Ginzberg). Gaines figured that if people enjoyed reading comics in their newspapers, why not sell them separately. He shared his idea with his friend Harry L Wildenberg at Eastern Color Printing and in February 1934, Eastern's Famous Funnies #1 became the first American comic book sold to the public. [http://uahc.org/rjmag/03winter/]

Gaines was the father of William M. Gaines, creator of a slew of horror comic book titles as well as Mad Comics and later, Mad Magazine (with the legendary Harvey Kurtzman). The National Foundation for Jewish Culture sums up their contribution in the article "Jews in Pen and Ink." [http://tinyurl.com/6q3qd]

In a lovely twist of fate, Arie Kaplan, the author who documented the role of Jews in comics, now writes regularly for Mad Magazine. [www.ariekaplan.com/]

As for the superheroes, whether you are a fan of DC comics' Superman or a disciple of rival Marvel Comic's Spider-Man, the origins are still Jewish. Super-Mans' well-known creators were a couple of guys named Joe Shuster and Jerry Siegel. Over at Marvel, Stan Lee and Jack Kirby (formerly Stanley Lieber and Jacob Kurtzberg) were responsible for Spider-Man, the X-Men and many others.

Although these characters didn't wear kippahs or sport Magen Davids, author Arie Kaplan argues that the characters were imbued with Jewish symbolism and allusions to the plight of Jews in the 1930s and '40s. Superman, he explains, "is a child survivor named Kal-El (in Hebrew, 'All that is God') from the planet Krypton, whose population, a race of brilliant scientists, is decimated. His parents send him to Earth in a tiny rocket ship, reminiscent of how baby Moses survived Pharaoh's decree to kill all Jewish newborn sons."

Don't expect to find unanimity in the comic book universe. Steve Bergson is a librarian at the Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Public Library of Toronto and has a collection of about 600 Jewish comic books, one of the largest in the world. But he doesn't buy the Superman-is-Jewish theory. [http://tinyurl.com/4nwrk] As for which characters do count as Jewish, check out Bergson's huge website. [http://tinyurl.com/4nhq4]

Although comic books and graphic novels with a more serious bent are not new, the publication of Art Spiegelman's Maus in 1986 was a historic event. The autobiographical story retells his family's ordeal trying to stay alive during the Shoah. To tell his story, Spiegelman has drawn all the Jews as mice and the Nazis as cats. Maus was awarded the Pulitzer Prize in 1992 and has become the subject of scholarly articles and school curriculums. [www.geocities.com/Athens/Atlantis/2671/] Spiegelman recently published his first major work since Maus. In the Shadow of No Towers tells the story of Spiegelman living near the World Trade Center on 9/11 and dealing with the depression that followed. National Public Radio has put together several Spiegelman interviews, in which he talks about his books and cartooning. [http://tinyurl.com/4tabk]

Why have so many Jews found themselves in the comic book business? Here is writer Victor Wishna's explanation. "Mostly sons of immigrants or immigrants themselves, shut out of publishing and commercial art by anti-Semitism, their comic-book creations took up their struggle, fighting for truth, justice and the American way." [http://tinyurl.com/6xwpb] For more theories, check out Mechem Wecker's "It's a Bird, It's a Plane, It's... Super Mensch!" [http://tinyurl.com/5agxb]

Appleby to be honoured at JNF Negev Dinner

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

"The greatest thing I ever did was to co-chair, with Howard Sokolowski, the 2002-03 UJA campaign – at the height of terror in Israel," says Ronald (Ronnie) Appleby, the 2004 Negev Dinner honoree.

A prominent tax and estate-planning lawyer, Appleby, 60, says that, at the time, no one was travelling to Israel.

"We raised more money per capita than anywhere else in the world. All my family members – my wife, Bunnie, and my children, all became involved. That is our family's pattern – to work together."

The 2004 Ronald Appleby Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Dinner will be held on Nov. 28 at the Sheraton Centre Hotel. Chairs of the dinner are Harley Mintz and Howard Sokolowski.

Appleby's commitment to his community has been demonstrated by his involvement with many organizations. He is a member of boards of hospitals, schools and charities. A strong supporter of Israel, he has visited the country more than 20 times and spent two months in Jerusalem on sabbatical.

Appleby's parents, Moishe and Jennie, lived in the College and Euclid area of Toronto when their son was born. Moishe was a theatre manager.

Appleby attended Northview Heights Collegiate Institute and received a degree in commerce and finance from the University of Toronto.

He attended Osgoode Hall Law School, and in 1968, he was the first Jew to article with Osler, Hoskin & Harcourt LLP. After being called to the bar, he was hired by the firm. Then, 18 months later, he became a partner with Robins, Appleby & Taub LLP.

He taught tax planning at Osgoode Hall for 15 years and was frequently published in legal journals.

Appleby also holds corporate directorships with Olympia and York Properties Corporation. and Trimark Trust Company.

His involvement with the Jewish community began when he was still a student. He enrolled in the United Jewish Welfare Fund's (now UJA Federation) leadership development program. After two years, he was invited to become a member of the executive committee and served as treasurer. In 1973, he chaired the lawyers' division of the UJA.

Appleby went on to take major roles in numerous civic, philanthropic and cultural endeavours. He served as president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University and chaired fundraising campaigns and dinners at Princess Margaret Hospital, Mount Sinai Hospital, Weizmann Institute, Reena Foundation and JNF.

He says, "I was brought up to cherish Judaism, tzedakah and Israel by my parents." He adds that he attended Rabbi Avrohom Price's yeshiva after school and studied with Chabad Lubavitch. A member of Adath Israel Synagogue, he frequently participates in the services.

It is most appropriate that Appleby, a devoted family man, has designated the funds raised by this year's Negev Dinner to establish the Appleby Fund for Israel's Children.

As well, money is earmarked for a program in forestry, landscape management and sustainable development. This JNF project, which will protect the environment, is shared with the Hebrew University.

Appleby married Bunnie (née Spring) 37 years ago. "Whenever I take anything on," he says, "Bunnie becomes totally involved."

She has a degree in psychology and has taught high school. The couple have four children, Dawn, Corry, Kyle and Marni.

Appleby adds that it "is a wonderful feeling that I have both my parents and my mother-in-law, Elaine Spring, who are able to enjoy this wonderful occasion with our whole family."

He says he has been blessed with a wonderful family, "a successful career, with the best clients who have become my close friends, and many varied community involvements.

"These have added a dimension to my life which makes me a complete person – not one-dimensional. I believe that you have to keep excited in life."

Ronald Appleby, JNF Negev Dinner honoree and his wife Bunnie.

Reconstructionist shul buys Adath Sholom building

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Toronto's Reconstructionist congregation has purchased a synagogue building after spending the past three decades in rented premises.

Congregation Darchei Noam, which was established 30 years ago and has been meeting in the B'nai Brith Canada building on Hove Street since 1989, bought Adath Sholom Congregation's building on nearby Sheppard Avenue West in September.

"We'd been looking for seven years, and negotiating for over a year," said Syd Nestel, Darchei Noam's vice-president, development.

The Reconstructionist congregation has about 300 member families, and is planning to renovate and expand their new spiritual home after the sale closes October 31, 2005. The project is expected to take nine months to a year. A $3-million capital campaign has been launched, said Nestel. A large social hall, a second floor, and classroom space for a school, are items they hope to add, he said.

"We've gotten too big [for our current space], and we want to continue growing." Nestel said synagogue membership has grown about 20 per cent since Rabbi Tina Grimberg became spiritual leader two years ago. "We're projecting 600 adults in the next four to five years."

He attributes the growth in part to an increase in young families moving into the neighbourhood, as well as to serving the entire city as the only Reconstructionist congregation.

He expects the move to take place between fall 2006 and summer 2007, when Darchei Noam's lease at B'nai Brith is up.

The congregation of Adath Sholom, meanwhile, is looking to amalgamate with another synagogue, said president Morey Eckler. A planned merger with Beit Rayim Synagogue in Richmond Hill fell through last year.

Israel has defeated Palestinians in intifadah: Oren

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel has snatched victory from the jaws of defeat in the current Palestinian uprising, an Israeli analyst said last month in Toronto.

At the outset of the intifadah, Israel was torn by self-doubt that victory was even possible in the low-grade war of attrition against Palestinian terrorism, Michael Oren told an audience at Holy Blossom Temple.

Indeed, the forces of Islamic terror initially gained an edge because Israel was unprepared for the kind of war that targeted its urban heartland, Oren said, in the first Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lecture of the 2004 fall season.

But 2½ years ago, following a suicide bombing that killed 29 civilians in a Netanya hotel on Passover, Israel abandoned its policy of relative restraint and struck back hard, putting the terrorists on the defensive.

In a personal touch, Oren, an American by birth, noted that his 21-year-old son, Yoav, has taken part in anti-terror raids.

Since the spring of 2002, Israel has taken the necessary counter-measures to deal with the situation – continuing with its military operations and building a security fence in and along the West Bank to keep out terrorists, said Oren, a senior fellow at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem and the author of Six Days of War, an acclaimed account of the 1967 Six Day War.

As a result of Israel's efforts, terrorism has been all but crushed. The occasional suicide bombings that still rock Israel represent the "last gasps of a [Palestinian] war that has failed."

He added, "Israel not only survived the onslaught, but won. From a state of near-paralysis, Israel has rebounded."

Life in Israeli cities has returned to normal, with hotels full and restaurants filled to the brim, and Israelis have shown themselves to be resilient.

Citing an example, he told of how the bombed Hillel Café in Jerusalem was immediately rebuilt and reopened after suicide bombers killed eight of its patrons one night.

Generally praising Israel's indomitable spirit, he observed, "Israel twitched, but never blinked, and did not allow itself to be paralyzed."

However, he warned that victory against terrorism is a gradual process rather than a single event.

Israel must maintain constant vigilance, it should be aware that attempts to ease restrictions on Palestinian civilians have backfired in the past, and it should be ready to face a "new war" in the guise of Palestinian rocket attacks on Israeli towns and cities, Oren said.

Israel's "greatest victory" in the intifadah – which he described as an existential "war of survival" – was proving that terrorism can be eradicated without sacrificing democratic values, he added.

Expounding on a thesis he outlined in a recent edition of the New Republic magazine, Oren said the key to defeating terrorism is for a society to maintain cohesion and resilience, build a security barrier, eliminate terrorist leaders in pinpoint strikes and preserve international alliances.

But he said Israel has paid an external and internal price for its victory: Europe still believes that Palestinian terrorism is a reaction to Israel's occupation of the territories, and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is commonly equated with Nazis. At home, some soldiers refuse to serve in the West Bank and Gaza.

According to Oren, Israel used only a fraction of its military prowess to defeat the Palestinians – a growing number of whom realize they have lost.

Their goal was to unravel Israel before destroying it. He said the root cause of the intifadah was the Palestinians' refusal to accept Israel's permanent existence as a Jewish state.

With the signing of the Oslo accords, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat recognized Israel, but not as a Jewish state, Oren said.

Arafat's demand at the 2000 Camp David summit that Palestinian refugees be allowed to return to their former homes in what is now Israel was proof of his strategic objective, he said.

And the vast majority of Palestinians supported his position, he pointed out.

Michael Oren

Looking ahead, Oren said peace talks with the Palestinians still lie beyond the horizon.

"All we can do now is to batten down the hatches and wait for a Palestinian leadership capable of negotiating a two-state solution."

If Israel holds fast, the Palestinians will eventually come around, he said.

In a sign of support for Sharon's Gaza withdrawal plan, Oren said Israel cannot occupy Gaza and maintain its Jewish and democratic character.

Police say only minority of hate crimes reported

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Only an estimated 20 per cent of hate crimes are reported to the police, says a detective with the Toronto Police Service's hate crimes unit.

"[When we put out] a list, it is just an indicator of what is going on. It is not the actual numbers," Det. James Hogan told a recent panel discussion sponsored by the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section.

Also speaking on the panel were Glenn DiPasquale, chief psychologist for the York Region District School Board, and Len Rudner, director of community relations with Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. The moderator was Ellie Tesher, a Toronto Star syndicated advice columnist.

Hogan said that when police talk about hate crimes, they talk about actual crimes. "Shouting [racist words] at students can be anti-Semitic, but it's not a crime. Our picture is always more restrictive in what we can capture."

After Sept. 11, the number of hate crimes reported to the police "went through the roof," with the victims divided evenly between Jews and Muslims, but "the numbers, however, have now dropped," he said.

But Hogan added that "[the numbers don't speak] about the impact of the incidents."

At Ryerson University, where a man was recently charged with mischief and uttering death threats in connection with an anti-Muslim and anti-Jewish leaflet and graffiti campaign, "one person put the whole university into turmoil," Hogan said.

"It is hard to express that. Even though we dealt with the issue, we cannot un-alarm the people."

The law is a blunt instrument that "can only go so far," he said. "

"On the Internet, there is a whole world of evil [that people can access] at the click of a button. These sites are not hosted by Canadian addresses. We are powerless if they are run out of the United States."

Some people have an image of hate that includes skinheads and white supremacists, he said, "but if that's all we're looking for, then we miss a whole lot. It is simplistic to believe that there is not a lot else going on."

His experience, Hogan said, is that education and prevention are the keys to dealing with hate crimes. "We cannot be everywhere, so prevention is what we need to look at."

Numbers went 'through the roof' after September 11

DiPasquale agreed that many people have unrealistic expectations when it comes to the legal system. "It is not designed to prevent crimes. People learn from consequences, and the consequences have to be immediate."

Having done extensive research on bullying, he said he has learned that bullying is a strategy used by racists. "We think of bullying in terms of physical harm, but it can also be psychological.

"It be can overt or subtle, and it can be exclusionary. People can be isolated socially, and even if no one touches them, they can be made miserable. Bullying always involves an imbalance of power, and that can be psychological or social power."

Rudner talked about a childhood incident in which three non-Jewish boys followed him home. When it became clear that they meant harm, he said, he began knocking on a neighbour's door, but she wouldn't open it.

"I don't remember the pain [inflicted by] the kids, but I do remember the face of the woman who watched and did nothing," Rudner said.

"When we talk about combating racism and advocating tolerance, we have to lift the words off the page… We have to promise not to be the face that people remember in that way."

Terror and the Defence of the West

Can the West maintain itself as a liberal and democratic society in the face of a new kind of war, one which may require changes to Western society? What is the place of Israel and the Jews in this war against terrorism — separate from the West or part of the defence of the West? What are the roles of Canada and America in this war on terror? How do we understand the new onslaught of Radical Islamic terrorism from a historical perspective? Please join us for the third of four lectures.

New Mazon director emphasizes fundraising

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Shira Lester-Cohen, new executive director of Mazon Canada, A Jewish Response to Hunger, moved to a new home with her family, her children asked her if they're rich.

"I took that as an opportunity to say yes. I told them we all love each other, and we have food on the table. That makes us rich.

Shira Lester-Cohen

"In our privileged community, we need to reinforce that [sentiment]. We have to remind our kids that they should be thankful for what they have, and that they should share," she says.

Lester-Cohen, who succeeds Jacqueline Kott-Wolle, is originally from Montreal and has a law degree from McGill University.

Her most recent job was co-ordinator of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's committee for Yiddish. "I applied for this job when Jacqueline told me she was leaving because it fits with my philosophy.

"I believe in tzedakah and tikkun olam. I wanted to live that life and be an example to my kids. What is more fundamental than hunger relief?"

The fact that there are people who skip meals as a budgeting strategy, she says, "puts our superficial wants in perspective. We are trying not to eat, and there are people who do not have the money to buy the basics."

Mazon is a unique Jewish organization, she says, because its allocations are non-denominational. "That says something special about our community. I recently received a call from a native community in British Columbia that was looking for funding for its breakfast and lunch program. Without that program, the kids would not eat."

Mazon allocates across the country from the Toronto office, Lester-Cohen says, but she would like to see offices in eastern and western Canada.

In last spring's allocations, Mazon granted $200,000 to such organizations as the Jewish Family Services of Edmonton, Inland Refugee Society in Vancouver, Community Food Basket of Saint John, Metro Food Bank Society in Halifax and Action Communautaire in Montreal.

Locally, it has helped support several Out of the Cold programs, Food Path Hamilton, Scarborough Housing Help Centre and Nellie's Toronto.

The main focus of the year is the annual gala taking place Feb. 16, 2005. "Volunteers work tirelessly on that throughout the year.

"We also raise money through the 'three per cent' principle. Be thankful for all you have and donate three per cent of your catering bill to Mazon. That is the principle we were founded on, and it is fundamental to our mandate."

She encourages hosts to provide place cards that tell people they have donated to Mazon. "That way guests will see that it is a great idea for them as well."

Mazon tries to allocate money to everyone who meets their requirements, she says, "but there is never enough money. We are a grassroots, front-line response to hunger. We provide money so people running such things as lunch or breakfast programs can buy food so kids and adults can eat."

Focus on excellence would increase commitment to day schools

By BRENDA STEIN DZALDOV

School Parents SPEAK

There are many factors that affect a family's decision to send their children to Jewish day school. One is the key expectation that they will receive an exceptional education.

Parents expect an education that encompasses high curricular standards, current teaching methods, extra support for diverse learners, character-building and relevant and meaningful assessment and evaluation. As well, they expect their children to be taught the fundamentals of Jewish religion, language and culture.

Of course, parents also expect that their children will be treated with kindness, respect and dignity while having their thinking valued and their individual differences recognized.

Doing all of that is a formidable challenge. However, it is a challenge that must be met in order for Jewish education to remain a viable option for parents. It is imperative that the Jewish day school system not just keep up, but lead the way in terms of excellence in education.

In order to create sustainable educational improvement, our Jewish day schools need to provide:

• strong leadership;
• ongoing professional development for teachers and administrators in all areas of curriculum, technology and character education that encompasses current, research-based theory;
• capacity building – the collective power of a group, including teachers and principals, to collaborate to make improvements using current ideas and resources;
• accessibility to expert teachers in the schools to share, model and mentor;
• money for necessary teaching and professional resources, both within the school and at the board level in the form of shared educational materials;
• current, and ongoing, assessment and evaluation that guides teaching and directs goal-setting for students;
• accountability by teachers to administration and parents;
• appreciation for the hard-working, life-changing teachers that we have in our schools and who make a difference for the students they teach.

Only when these ideals and initiatives become standard will the Jewish day school system consistently keep up with the ever-changing educational milieu that Canadian Jews now live in.

Commitment to Jewish education is a multi-faceted issue, and I believe that a focus by the leaders of Jewish day schools to ensure excellence in education will promote a greater commitment by the community to a Jewish education for their children.

Brenda Stein Dzaldov, M.Ed., is a literacy teacher and special education teacher with the York Region District School Board and the parent of three children at Associated Hebrew Schools.

Zareinu set to host fundraiser on Nov. 21

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

Zareinu Educational Centre of Metropolitan Toronto, a school for children with physical disabilities and developmental delays, is hosting an evening of fashion and song on Nov. 21.

The event is an opportunity for the community to learn about the centre and the valuable work that is done there. It is acclaimed internationally as a centre of excellence in special education and intervention therapies.

Recently, the school expanded its educational program to include children of high school age.

Children at Zareinu benefit from the skilled faculty that includes speech therapists, occupational therapists, music therapists and life skills interventionists.

Last year, the centre set up an innovative classroom for students with autism spectrum disorder based on the theories of applied behaviour analysis. The classroom is one of the first of its kind in Canada and has proven to be a success.

Virtually all of the children attending Zareinu are subsidized, as the cost to run each individual program is prohibitive. In addition, the centre has outgrown its present facility and is hoping to expand and build a new school of its own to accommodate more children who could benefit from such a centre.

Zareinu raises money through its annual moveathon held in the spring, and through the circulation of Zareinu dollars.

The upcoming evening was the vision of Andrea Shapiro Kreidstein, who became involved with Zareinu after her friend Evan Sone, a former Zareinu parent and board member, asked her to help out with the annual golf tournament fundraiser. Shapiro Kreidstein decided to use her musical talent to help the students.

The evening, to be held at the Sephardic Kehilla Centre, will be hosted by television personality Adrienne Gold.

Women's elegant attire will be showcased in the designs of Georges Rech of Bloor Street with accessories by Colette Jewelry.

Zero 20 bambini will provide the children's fashions, and some of the child models will be Zareinu students or graduates.

Famed architect to talk in Toronto

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

In the summer of 1989, architect Daniel Libeskind had set the course for an idyllic life in Los Angeles. He had accepted a prestigious appointment as resident senior scholar at the Getty Center. It was a plum position with assistants, offices, an unlimited travel budget and a house with a view of the ocean for his young family.

But Libeskind, 58, abandoned what he called a "life of Nirvana" to pursue a dream.

After winning the design competition for the Jewish Museum, Berlin, he and his wife Nina and their three children moved to that city "to try to build a building that nobody wanted to be built," he said in a recent telephone interview from New York. "We had no money. We were thought to be completely crazy."

It took three years to get the project on track. By the time the museum was completed in 1999 – it was Libeskind's first building – he had become an internationally renowned architect.

In 2003, he won one of the most important architectural commissions of the 21st century – the master plan for redeveloping the World Trade Center site after the 9-11 bombing. Today Libeskind has a staff of 125 architects working on projects all over the world including the newly designed wing of the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto.

The globe-trotting Libeskind – officially he is the U.S. cultural ambassador of architecture – will be speaking at an upcoming gala in support of Camp Gesher, about his building projects and events in his life that have influenced his unique architectural vision.

The event, An Evening with Daniel Libeskind, takes place 7:30 p.m. on Nov. 16 at the York Event Theatre, 101 Eglinton Ave. E. Libeskind will also be signing copies of his newly released autobiography, Breaking Ground.

So what is the connection between one of the world's most celebrated architects and Camp Gesher, the Habonim Dror camp located north of Kingston?

Libeskind's 15-year-old daughter Rachel, just so happens to be a camper there. She travelled to camp all the way from Berlin every summer until the family's recent move to New York.

Nina Libeskind told The CJN that she and her husband chose Gesher because it was Zionist and a progressive Jewish camp.

"We were looking for a camp with ethical principles and values and we both believe in Israel."

The unstated fact is that Gesher is close to Toronto where the Libeskinds have strong family ties. Nina is a native Torontonian who hales from one of the country's most prominent political families. Her father David Lewis, founded the New Democratic Party, and older brother Stephen, a former leader of the Ontario NDP and UN ambassador for Canada, currently is the UN special envoy for AIDS.

Daniel Libeskind redesigning ROM

Libeskind, the son of Holocaust survivors, spent his childhood in Poland, Israel and New York. He said he has always been a determined person who is not easily derailed. "I inherited from my mother an angry resolve."

He also attributes his professional success – particularly those formative years in Berlin – to his wife, who is also his business partner. "It's a love story. I would have never done it without her … That she never gave up is an incredible accomplishment."

Indeed, forgoing the cushy life in Los Angeles to get the Berlin museum built was the obvious choice, Nina said, speaking from a New York airport.

"I didn't know how important the project was for Daniel's career. I knew how important it was for him as a human being and as a Jew. It was very personal."

Libeskind wrote about the many obstacles he encountered in Berlin, crediting Nina with resolving those problems, which included borrowing money from the bank so the family could survive, to lobbying Berlin politicians so that the project could be realized.

She said her political upbringing prepared her for the hurdles in Berlin. "You take a step backward and you see how the world works."

In July of 1991, the Berlin senate voted to shut the project down. Nina said that one of her tactics was the use of the international press to help sway public opinion about the project's cancellation. "People just picked up on its (the museum's) importance."

She said she did not expect her campaign to be successful, but three months later, the Berlin parliament overturned the senate's decision. "I couldn't believe it. I was totally in shock."

There were many memorable moments throughout the museum's construction, from the 17 groundbreaking events to the galas following the project's completion, she said. However, the "highest moment" was at a 1999 museum reception when the then German chancellor, Gerhard Schroeder, knelt down in front of Libeskind's 90-year-old father, Nachman, to thank him for making the trip from New York.

Libeskind describes this event in his book: "What a moment for Nachman – and for me! Never in my Polish boyhood could I have imagined a day when the chancellor of Germany, the son of a Wehrmacht soldier killed in action in World War II, would kneel before my father and thank him for coming to Germany."

The experience in Berlin prepared the couple for the intense competition for the World Trade Center commission and the ensuing challenges, Nina said, stressing that the importance of the World Trade Center commission went "way beyond ego and professional ambition. You fight for a project because of what it means for everybody."

Obituary

Businessman noted for community, shul leadership

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Entrepreneur and community leader John Fienberg died on Oct. 21 of a heart attack. He was 87.

He was eulogized at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, where he served as president between 1962 and 1967 and where he was honoured at its 75th anniversary celebration the week before his death as one of the synagogue's past presidents.

John Fienberg

Fienberg became a member of Shaarei Shomayim when it was on Christie Street. He remained active in the shul when it moved to St. Clair Avenue and was president when the congregation settled into its present location on Glencairn Avenue.

Shaarei Shomayim's senior rabbi, Rabbi Moshe Shulman, spoke of the three crowns Fienberg wore: "Kingship, [symbolizing] communal leadership; priesthood, [symbolizing] synagogue life; and Torah [symbolizing the leading of] a Jewish life.

"John Fienberg wore all three crowns throughout his life. But the crown of a good name rises above them all," Rabbi Shulman said.

Speaking on behalf of Fienberg's five children, Louise and Stanley told of their father's entrepreneurial skills.

He graduated from Harbord Collegiate in 1936. While still at school, he and a friend opened a hot dog stand at Jackson's Point and later operated 12 stands at various resort areas.

He also began trading souvenirs, travelling as far away as Japan for novelties and formed Oriental Importing Co. and Metropolitan Supply Co.

Fienberg's talent for business also took him into construction. He founded JDF Builders, which eventually became Consolidated Building Corp., where he was chairman of the board. Consolidated became one of the largest low-cost housing builders in Canada and the first housing corporation to be listed on the Toronto Stock Exchange.

He went on to build the Regency Towers Hotel, the first hotel in Toronto to be built after the war.

Fienberg also contributed to the wider Jewish community, serving as chair of the 1959 UJA campaign and chair of the Mount Sinai Hospital expansion drive in 1966, and he was active at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, and many other organizations and initiatives.

"For our dad, charity began at home," Louise said. "Father lived for Friday night dinners. No matter how busy we were, Friday dinners were special."

She added: "Our dad never indulged his children. However, he guaranteed all of us two things: a good name and a good education."

In 1974, he and his wife Rosslyn moved to Carlsbad, Calif.,where he became a regular at the spa at La Costa. There, he transformed himself from a business executive to an outstanding tennis and racquetball player, a culinary expert and a gracious host to visitors.

In 1993, he and Rosslyn returned to Toronto after he suffered a stroke. His lifelong determination was evident when he began to walk again, proving his doctor's diagnosis wrong.

Stanley spoke of Shaarei Shomayim's 75th anniversary and how his father, "proudly came to the front, walking with difficulty, and received a standing ovation from everyone in the hall. It was a touching moment and perhaps the best send-off he could have."

Fienberg is survived by his wife Rosslyn, children Barry and Cheryl, Stanley and Miriam, Louise Fienberg and Murray Fischer, Louis and Meg, Allen and Terry, and 12 grandchildren.

Former Montrealers gather for evening of fun and memories

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Some 300 former Montrealers recently descended upon the Beth Emeth Synagogue for an evening of noshing, schmoozing and laughter.

A Taste of Montreal, organized by the Jewish National Fund (JNF), was the second Toronto event to be held for Montrealers.

"It was a reason to bring former Montrealers together, said Ben Prossin, executive director of JNF. "We know there are many people from Montreal who have moved to Toronto.

"It was a great turnout. We had young people and pensioners and everybody in between. The reaction we had was very positive. Joanne [Brodkin, the events coordinator] did a great job."

There were two main attractions: hot Montreal-style smoked meat on rye and a humorous keynote address by Montreal radio personality Tommy Schnurmacher of CJAD, sister station to Toronto's CFRB.

"Whether you've been in Toronto 10, 20 or 30 years or you're a recent newcomer, Montreal will always be a part of who we are," said, Stephen Karr, who co-chaired the event with Jack Frymer.

Indeed, during the singing of O Canada, the audience spontaneously sang in French.

Karr said many Montreal couples speak "Franglais" so the kids won't understand them. "French is our Yiddish. And the way it's taught here, the kids will never understand."

"We still cheer Montreal sports teams," Frymer said. "We're Montrealers first and Torontonians second, no matter how long we live here."

Schnurmacher lambasted Concordia University for letting a small group of extremists prevent Israeli former prime ministers from speaking there. (Recently, both Benjamin Netanyahu and Ehud Barak have been barred from speaking at Concordia.)

"It's a real tragedy," Schnurmacher said. "The government should have intervened to guarantee free speech… I think the university should have stood up to these bullies."

He regaled the audience with political barbs aimed at politicians at all levels of government.

The Quebec government doesn't like "to waste health dollars on old people or people who get sick," he said.

Aiming at the federal government, he said: "We take care of the poor and downtrodden… like Bombardier," the airplane manufacturer that recently received a large government subsidy.

Schnurmacher was presented with a plaque indicating that trees were planted in his father's memory. The late Miklos Schnurmacher, a Montreal rabbi, died earlier this year.

Following Schnurmacher's speech, the crowd reconvened in the main hall for more noshing and schmoozing and some last minute bids on the silent auction.

JNF even distributed loot bags. All participants received copies of the Montreal Gazette, the Montreal Jewish Directory, an anthology of stories by Toronto-based author Alvin Abram and a Keren Kayemet (JNF) blue box.

Holy Blossom exhibition captures life of Holocaust hero

By ALISA MITCHELL
Special to The CJN

Janusz Korczak used his innovative educational ideas to establish and run the most progressive orphanage in Poland.

Holocaust Education Week

Korczak, a Polish Jewish children's writer and educator, made it his lifetime goal to bring justice, happiness and love into the lives of his children. His orphanage was forced to relocate into the Warsaw Ghetto, and he chose to die with his children in the Treblinka death camp rather than take the opportunity given to him by the Nazis to save himself.

"Janusz Korczak and the Children of the Warsaw Ghetto" is a travelling exhibition that encapsulates Korczak's life and career.

Produced by the Holocaust Education Centre in Vancouver, this enlightening and moving exhibit is now on display at Holy Blossom Temple as part of the 24th annual Holocaust Education Week.

The exhibit is a compilation of mounted photographs from the Ghetto Fighters Museum in Israel and the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, with accompanying narratives. It is divided into three interrelated parts: the life of Janus Korczak, the children of the Warsaw Ghetto and Korczak's influence on the children's rights movement today.

Korczak believed that first and foremost children should be treated as equals, and he used this vision as the driving force in his career.

To advocate for children's rights, he wrote books, established newspapers, conducted a weekly radio show and represented youth in juvenile courts.

Esther Hersh and Beryl Chernin, co-chairs of the Holy Blossom Fine Arts Committee, said that their committee chose to display the exhibit in an effort to spread awareness about Korczak and the importance of his career. Hersh added that once she learned about the Vancouver exhibit and its significance, she felt strongly, along with the rest of the committee, that it was extremely worthwhile. "He [Korczak] was an innovator and a visionary and we wanted to bring that to the attention of the community," Hersh said.

Andrzej Krezel, the Polish consul in Toronto, attended the exhibit's opening on Nov. 3. He said it is important to bring Korczak's contributions to education and children's rights to the attention of Canadians. "In Poland, unlike here, Janus Korczak is part of our tradition. He is present in our culture. To us, he is part of the air."

Krezel stressed that it is impossible to advocate for children's rights today, either in our own communities or abroad, without understanding the history of the movement, to which Korczak is inextricably linked.

Lesley Shore, an assistant professor at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education at the University of Toronto, said one-third of the world's children live in poverty, including 1.4 million Canadian children. Korczak laid the foundation for the advancement of children in the world, she said, and she advocated continuing to work in his footsteps using the strategies he implemented more than 60 years ago. "Through a global vision that respects his beliefs about children and their rights, we can keep the memory of Janus Korczak alive," she said.

The exhibition continues until the end of November. For more information, contact the Holy Blossom Temple office at 416-789-3291 or visit www.holyblossom.org.

Kelman educates journalists at Ryerson

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

What do Rosie Di Manno, Christie Blatchford, Brian Stewart and Ralph Benmergui have in common?

They're all graduates of Ryerson University's journalism program who have made their mark on Canadian print and broadcast journalism.

"Ryerson is extremely important to Canadian journalism, through our role in educating journalists, through our research, through our internship program and through the Ryerson Review of Journalism" said Suanne Kelman, the interim chair of Ryerson's school of journalism.

A tenured professor who has been on staff since 1993, she has held the position since July, but she is not interested in keeping it for good. "I have fought off all attempts to make me apply for the permanent post," she said.

Kelman, who teaches broadcast journalism, radio and television newscast, advanced broadcast reporting and – sometimes – radio documentary, is quite content to be a teacher.

"What I love is teaching, taking a group of people and helping them learn how to draw out people's stories and tell them," said Kelman, a 55-year-old graduate of the University of Toronto who has worked for the Globe and Mail and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and has been a freelance writer.

Her enthusiasm has rubbed off on many of her students, including CJN copy editor Daniel Wolgelerenter, who completed Ryerson's two-year journalism program for university graduates in 2000.

"Suanne was tough, but her assessments and criticisms were usually bang-on," he said. "She gave us some basic reporting tips that have stayed with me. And she was pretty funny."

Kelman also enjoys Ryerson because it enables her to pursue interests that were not media concerns until relatively recently – "issues of family life and human relationships, the personal rather than the public sphere. I wish that more working journalists had the time to explore and tell real stories."

A member of Temple Sinai, she was born in Toronto. Her now-retired parents, Jack and Georgia, were travel agents.

Kelman, the wife of Sunnybrook neuroradiologist Dr. Allan J. Fox, launched her career as a freelance writer, broadcaster and researcher after teaching English and African literature in Sierra Leone in 1974 and 1975.

"I lost my faith in the redemptive power of literature in Sierra Leone, and turned to journalism when I came back to Toronto," she said. "I think I was slow to mature. I loved school and took a lot of time to start noticing the more interesting outside world."

Kelman's first job in Toronto was as a producer for CBC radio's Sunday Morning. She was there from 1977 to 1984. She then jumped ship to CBC TV's The Journal, where she was also a producer.

She recalls those years with relish.

"Sunday Morning was an incredible experience, and one that I wish for my students. A great group of people under a genius [Mark Starowicz] looking for new ways of covering the world."

At The Journal, she learned a great deal, and still misses its host, the late Barbara Frum.

But after a while, she was no longer willing to fit into a team, and she missed writing.

"I was lucky to find part-time copy editing at the Globe, which gave me a base to start freelancing. I loved the work I was able to do.

"The highlights would include a piece on the 100th anniversary of Harbord Collegiate for Toronto Life, some fairly gritty work on domestic violence for Chatelaine and radio documentaries for [CBC's] Ideas and Sunday Morning.

"I continue to enjoy radio and magazine work above all other forms, but that's a personal quirk. For people with more patience and flexibility than I possess, television can be a very satisfying medium to work in."

Suanne Kelman

Like many women, Kelman encountered prejudice. "When I started, these were male worlds, not in the sense that no women worked in them, but in that men set the agenda and women tried to behave as much as possible like men," she explained.

"That has changed enormously. There are women in positions of authority, and a different value system."

She declined to be drawn into a discussion about the quality of big city journalism in Canada. But she did say Canada's self-styled national newspapers, the Globe and Mail and the National Post, are in need of improvement.

"I'd like to see more local coverage. I'd like to see more investigative work. I'd like to see a lot less about Britney Spears and more about local politics.

"I'd also like to see more wide-ranging foreign coverage. I'm always shocked at how much is written about Israel, a nation of less than seven million people, and how little about Indonesia, which has more than 200 million. There are whole areas of the world that we neglect completely."

Having said that, Kelman expressed satisfaction that the Canadian media are doing a better job than governments at setting the day's agenda.

And she likes the detailed stories on social issues the Globe and the Toronto Star have published of late.

She is also glad that CBC News has become less stuffy and that CTV's national news is far more rigorous than it used to be.

Asked what ails Canadian journalism, Kelman said, "I think journalism everywhere is at risk because news is being treated strictly as a business. I think that government and other institutions are withdrawing from direct communication with the public in favour of letting spinmasters package everything into neat, meaningless parcels of non-information."

As well, she is concerned about the concentration of ownership in the Canadian media.

Queen's U Hillel welcomes new director

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

For the first time in many years, Queen's University Hillel has an on-site staff person.

Stu Woolley – a 54-year-old former TV and film writer who worked most recently in accounts receivable management – took over in August from Montreal-based Sheldon Cohen. As director of Queen's Hillel, Woolley serves an estimated 800 students on the Kingston campus, about halfway between Toronto and Montreal.

He is also director of Trent University's Jewish Students Association, with an estimated 75 students, about two and a half hours from Kingston, in Peterborough. Jewish students and residents there are planning a joint fundraiser to raise money for the local synagogue, which suffered flood damage this summer.

A Kingston resident for six years, Woolley moved from Vancouver with his wife Lesly Wade-Woolley and their daughter Eve when Lesly became an education faculty member.

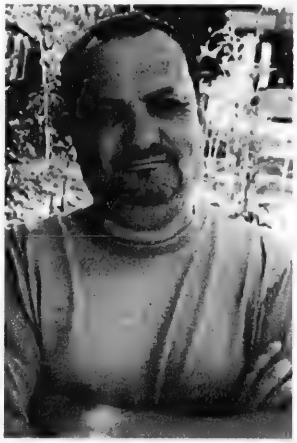
Although he grew up in Jewish areas of Montreal (Snowdon and St. Laurent), Woolley said that the 1,000 or so Kingston Jews are no less Jewish than their counterparts in larger communities, and "maybe even more so.

"It's a viable community with expectations of continuity," he said. "It's not in danger of disappearing, however if there aren't a sufficient number of people willing to put their shoulder to the wheel, even in a small way, the community won't function. Coming to Kingston retooled my understanding of myself as a Jew and how a Jewish community functions."

A volunteer at Kingston's annual Hadassah Bazaar and a member of the board of directors of Beth Israel Synagogue, Woolley also chairs the congregation's adult education program and runs its Jewish film series. The synagogue, one of two in town, owns Otterburn House, the 1834 Georgian heritage building next door that serves as Hillel House.

Although Woolley has yet to dig up official statistics, he hears anecdotally that the Jewish student population at Queen's – which "historically was not culturally diverse [but] that is changing" – is increasing every year and that there is a greater "momentum" (evidenced by enthusiasm and numbers) among Jewish students.

Woolley's hiring was prompted in part by an awareness of Queen's Hillel's increasingly dynamic and increasingly sophisticated programming, said Lance Davis, director of National Jewish Campus Life, a division of UIA Federations Canada, created last year as a resource for Canadian campuses. Funding for the position came in part from UIA, and in part from the Kingston Jewish community, he said.



Stu Woolley

Among Woolley's assets, said Davis, is his ability to serve as a bridge to the local community.

"We're growing," said Woolley of Hillel's membership, reflected by its mailing list of 400.

This year's opening barbecue attracted 255 students, and the first of their monthly (sometimes twice monthly) Shabbat dinners drew 145, about 50 more than anyone he spoke to could remember in the past. Thirteen years ago, according to CJN files, a similar event had an "unprecedented attendance" of 55.

Woolley would like to see students make more use of Hillel House, which will soon be opening on Wednesday nights for drop-in activities. "We'll open it more often if there's a demand," he said.

Upcoming Hillel events include a Shabbat dinner with Kingston's mayor, Harvey Rosen.

Woolley's philosophy concerning Hillel means "bringing Jewish students together in a way that everybody feels comfortable, in a 'big tent' environment."

The political situation at Queen's does not include the "stress and distress" evident in clashes between pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian factions at campuses like Concordia, York and Simon Fraser, he noted. "Obviously there are strong political feelings on both sides, but so far as I have seen the discourse has been thoroughly Canadian. It's been civil, [and] certainly peaceful... Jewish students and members of the pro-Palestinian organizations all feel we don't want to go down the road of York or Concordia. There seems to be a desire to keep the 'skirmishes' [such as op-ed pieces in the campus paper] from becoming overly politicized."

Kensington Place Retirement Residence

Opened September '04 to rave reviews

From the moment the first shovel was turned in the ground, the impact of Kensington Place Retirement Residence on the Toronto retirement lifestyle scene has been unprecedented. The buzz spread like wildfire: at last, Toronto seniors would have access to a residence with the kind of amenities normally found only in luxury hotels. With the kind of fine dining you'd expect in a five-star restaurant. With exercise and recreational facilities rivalling those of some health and social clubs. In short, a country club environment with all the trappings of home.

All this, at the most convenient location possible — Sheppard and the Allen Road, with immediate access to two major thoroughfares — at competitive prices.

Was this really possible?

As Kensington rapidly took shape, the community watched and waited with a mixture of skepticism and hope.

Finally, the moment of truth arrived. Grand Opening, September 12, 2004. Kensington flung open its doors to some 400 eager guests who came to see, taste, and inspect. And to answer for themselves the $64 million question: Is Kensington Place all it's cracked up to be?

NO, it isn't. It's better.

As anyone who's been to Kensington will tell you, it takes all of ten seconds to see that this is no ordinary retirement residence. From the regally appointed front foyer and lounge, complete with working fireplace and majestic oak staircase, to the spectacular main dining area flanked by a stately private dining room for private functions, absolutely no expense has been spared to make this residence the ultimate living experience. From every conceivable standpoint — comfort, beauty, and safety — Kensington has redefined "state-of-the-art". The facilities, decor and furnishings are sumptuous, yet Kensington effuses the warmth and coziness essential to any home environment. So moved were guests at the grand opening, in fact, that many exclaimed, "What move in next year? I'm moving in today!"

And they have; in two short months,

Kensington has already achieved 40% occupancy.

With some 15 years of experience in retirement lifestyle, in a broad cross-section of roles from recreation to event planning to support services, Community Relations Manager Marlene White has managed and visited many elegant residences, yet even she has to pinch herself at times at Kensington's opulence. "It's almost too nice," she says. "But nothing is too good for your own family, so when it came to helping my mother find a retirement residence, there was no choice ... how could I not give her the best? And the amazing part of it is, the prices are comparable with what you'd pay elsewhere."

most comfortable surroundings

40% occupancy within two short months of opening

What greater testimonial than from a member of your own family? No fewer than three members of the Kensington administration have seen their next of kin take up residence here.

White's goal is singular: "To duplicate the freedom of the residents' home environment, enhance their living experience socially and recreationally, and facilitate their access to any type of service they might need."

Amenities include themed lounges on every floor

If ever a retirement residence could be described as luxurious and homey at the same time, Kensington is that place. Among other amenities, consider these:

- Gleaming strip oak hardwood floors and trim on every floor, accompanied by luxurious wool carpeting;
- Fine mahogany furniture in common areas;
- Exquisitely landscaped terraces where residents can relax amid greenery and flowers;
- Rooftop garden reminiscent of a luxury liner, complete with shuffleboard court, flower garden and barbeque facilities;
- 24-hour, self-serve in-house coffee bar with a variety of light refreshments;
- Recreation room complete with billiard table, widescreen TV with theatre seating, and walk-out to the deck lounge;
- Beauty salon for hair and nails, and spa equipped with therapeutic whirlpool bath;
- Fitness room where you can learn tai chee, yoga and other disciplines, exercise with free weights, or do stretching and freehand exercises at your own pace.
- Designer kitchen with reception area, working fireplace and widescreen TV — ideal for parties and special events.
- Two elevators, including a dedicated Shabbos elevator.
- Themed lounges on every residential floor:
  - Bal Harbour lounge (sixth floor): For the maritimer in you;
  - Palmerston Pub (fifth floor): for that old neighbourhood feeling;
  - Clearwater Lounge (fourth floor): an oasis of tranquility;
  - Pebble Beach (third floor): equipped with putting green!
  - High Kensington (second floor): much more comfortable than the market we remember fondly!

In an environment of such professionalism you'd expect the finest medical and support care, and that's exactly what you'll get. Both the Manager and the Director Of Care are RNs. There's a Physician on staff, an expert personal support staff, and a nursing staff equipped with portable phones for quick response.

All this, and we haven't even gotten to the living quarters yet!

Upcoming Bingo Open House Sunday Nov. 14

Kensington offers a variety of living arrangements tailored to your individual needs and budgets. From all-inclusive packages to respite care and assisted living, Kensington has a home for you at the right price.

Suites ranges from studio suites to two bedroom units, each equipped with kitchenette and full bath. A number of suites have private balconies. Elegantly furnished model suites of each type are available for viewing.

Says White, "When you're shopping for a retirement residence, do your research. Ask yourself these questions: "Is the staff friendly? Who's living here? Are they satisfied? Are they happy?"

If you're unsure, try it out for a few days and see if it feels like home!

For many seniors in the community, the question is not if they're moving into Kensington Place, but when.

Language is the key to fighting anti-Semitism

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

In order to combat anti-Semitism, educators must first identify and address anti-Semitic language, says Shulamit Imber, pedagogical director of the International School for Holocaust Studies at Yad Vashem.

During a recent Holocaust Education Week discussion titled "The Language of Anti-Semitism – Challenges to Holocaust Education and Remembrance Today," Imber and Dr. Karen Mock, executive director of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, spoke at the Beth Tikvah synagogue about the nature of anti-Semitic language and the Holocaust education reforms that Yad Vashem has implemented in Europe.

Imber and Mock said anti-Semitic language is rooted in Holocaust language.

"People say [Israeli Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon is like Hitler," said Imber. "Anti-Semitism takes a lot of Holocaust language and this is very frightening."

The language of the Holocaust has been appropriated, said Mock. "When we speak of the Holocaust, the appropriation of language is that 'you have your Holocaust' and 'we have our Holocaust.'"

Imber said many countries don't understand that anti-Semitism isn't just words, but a threat to democracy.

"Not only is it the business of Jews to deal with anti-Semitism, we have to find allies and explain to them that anti-Semitism won't end with Jews. It's a whole system that threatens democracy."

Five years ago, Imber and the International School for Holocaust Studies at Yad Vashem decided to try to change perceptions of anti-Semitism by teaching middle school and high school students in Europe about the Holocaust and anti-Semitism.

To help students understand the language of anti-Semitism, Imber showed classes a popular 1930s German children's book, Poison Mushroom. During the Nazi regime, this book taught German children that Jews resemble animals and can be identified by their curved noses.

"We bring this to students today because we want to identify the language of anti-Semitism and the methods that were used in the '30s," said Imber. "We have to explain to them what propaganda did and why these books and negative images were accepted by people."

She added that many Germans were influenced by propaganda because they never had a positive image of a Jew and that anti-Semitism is prevalent in the world today because of a lack of positive images of Jews.

Imber told the European students stories of two 13-year-old Jews who faced anti-Semitism in school during the Holocaust era. After telling the stories, she felt the students respond right away.

"The kids immediately felt empathy with the child…" When you bring the human face of the Jew to them, they begin to have a sense of connection and empathy to that child, she said.

Students in France, she added, wanted to meet Jewish students after they learned about anti-Semitism and the Holocaust.

Imber has been promoting Holocaust education internationally. Twenty-seven countries now have Holocaust remembrance days (on Jan. 27). "To fight anti-Semitism, you need allies," she said. "This means we have allies."

While Europe has become more active in Holocaust education, Canada is still lacking the resources to teach Holocaust education effectively, Mock said.

"On the positive side, every province has declared Yom Hashoah an official commemorative day," she said. "The Canadian government has also acknowledged that Yom Hashoah is an official commemorative day, so you do have educators across the country becoming more aware. Regretfully, it's not consistent, so there are very few actual resources."

To help with the shortage of resources, Mock created the Yom Hashoah teacher's guide when she was the national director of the B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

Mock used many ideas from the Yad Vashem model of Holocaust education in her guide.

"There's that notion of personalizing the story, of naming names and of making it very real so young people can understand," she said.

CHILDREN OF HOLOCAUST SURVIVORS: A conference for adult children of Holocaust survivors was held recently at Baycrest Centre. "Survivor Families: From Generation to Generation" featured guest speakers Lev Raphael, one of America's earliest second-generation writers, and human rights activist Jeanette Friedman, who is known internationally for her efforts in identifying and supporting the needs of Holocaust survivors and their families. One hundred and sixty conference attendees participated in workshops and found strength in sharing common experiences. Exploring Nazis' religion

Were the Nazis Christians?

Though Nazi Germany's population was overwhelmingly Christian and Adolf Hitler himself was a baptized, albeit nominal Catholic, the answer to the question is far more complicated than it may seem.

At a Holocaust Education Week event last week, Prof. Doris Bergen, a professor of history at Notre Dame University, broke the question into three parts. Statistically, Germans in the Third Reich and their leaders were Christians; philosophically, there were undeniable links between Nazism and Christianity; and institutionally, the answer is "complex," Bergen told an audience of mainly Christian theology students at Tyndale University College and Seminary in North York.

In 1933, the year Hitler came to power, 97 per cent of Germans were baptized, dues-paying members of recognized churches, mainly Lutheran and other Protestant denominations, and the Roman Catholic church, Bergen noted.

By 1940, there was little drop-off: 95 per cent of Germans still belonged to Christian churches.

"The vast majority viewed themselves as Christian," Bergen said. "And the overwhelming majority of [top] Nazis were Christians."

The Wehrmacht – the German army – employed Christian chaplains, Bergen stated, and the deportation and mass killings of Jews were often halted to mark Christian holidays.

"The perpetrators [of the Holocaust] were steeped in Christian tradition," she said, and putting a spin on Holocaust scholar Elie Wiesel's oft-quoted phrase, she added, "not all Christians were perpetrators but all perpetrators were Christian."

Nazi anti-Semitism, meanwhile, was not a product of Christianity, but there were "uneasy" connections between the two. "The legacy of Christian anti-Semitism was not a direct cause [of Nazi ideology], but it certainly was a necessary factor. Medieval notions of anti-Semitism provided the foundation and [Nazis] built on them."

The Nazis also appropriated Christian symbols, painting Hitler as a saviour and portraying Germany as "resurrected."

Among the most vivid examples of institutional ties between Christianity and Nazism is the agreement, or concordat, Hitler signed with the Vatican just seven months after assuming power.

Under the pact, Nazi Germany recognized and guaranteed freedom of profession and public practice of Catholicism, while the Vatican recognized the legitimacy of the Nazi state.

Bergen also described the so-called German-Christians, a 600,000-strong movement that worked to create "a manly, anti-Semitic, dogmatic Christianity."

An element of Protestantism, the German-Christian movement sought to "Aryanize" Christianity and rid traditional Christianity of all Jewish components.

Though top Nazis, Hitler included, were fascinated by mysticism and the occult, the "reality of the fact is that churches were the only institution [in Nazi Germany] to survive intact, and that was because they maintained an image of being both Nazi and Christian."

But churches were divided. Some theologians and rank-and-file Christians opposed Hitler, their numbers including many Righteous Among the Nations.

On the other hand, Christian churches "were able to coexist with the Nazis."

Bergen conceded her comments could cause disquiet for many Christians. She said there are other examples of churches accommodating evil, such as slavery, and the genocide in Rwanda, "the most Christian country in Africa."

Holocaust Education Week

Cookbooks created in midst of Ravensbrück horrors

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The differences in the concentration camp experiences of men and women are often ignored, charged Rochelle Saidel, senior scientific researcher at the Center for the Study of Women and Gender at the University of Sao Paulo and founder and executive director of the Remember The Women Institute.

Her recent publication, The Jewish Women of Ravensbrück Concentration Camp (University of Wisconsin Press) deals with the unique experiences of women in what was supposed to be merely a slave labour camp. In fact, near the end of the war, the Germans built a gas chamber there. Work was brutal, conditions got steadily worse and medical experimentation was carried on.

Saidel was speaking at Beth Sholom Synagogue, as part of the 24th annual Holocaust Education Week. The event was sponsored by the synagogue and UJA Federation Women's Campaign and Advocacy.

Ravensbrück, she said, was supposedly for female political prisoners, such as anti-Nazi dissidents; those in the resistance; asocials, as the Nazis called them, such as prostitutes, homosexuals and Gypsies; Jehovah's Witnesses; or prisoners of war. Each category wore a different coloured triangle.

There were also, she said, some "special prisoners," incarcerated as hostages because they were related to an important person on the Allied side.

Some of the women, Saidel said, were undoubtedly Jews who nobody knew were Jews, and had been posing as non-Jews. However, she said, of the 132,000 women who passed through Ravensbrück, some 20 per cent were Jewish, there simply because they were Jews.

Focusing on Ravensbrück, because it was the only camp created especially for women, Saidel said that there were both positive and negative aspects to the female experiences in concentration camps.

Women, whose sphere at that time was mostly in the home, had experience in taking care of food, sharing and nurturing, skills that helped make life a little more bearable. Unlike male prisoners, she said, they gave one another small gifts to raise their spirits. One survivor told Saidel that her most precious possession was an album, made out of purloined paper and string, in which everyone had written a message in her own language.

Women, men experienced concentration camp life differently

They wrote and talked about recipes and food as a way of remembering their homes, and in hope of having one once again. Cookbooks, full of shared recipes and culinary advice, were created. They confided in each other their fear that they would not be able to get pregnant after they were freed.

Then there was the other side of the coin.

Women in those days, especially Orthodox ones, were "raised to be modest," Saidel said. "It was excruciating to be forced to be naked in front of men. Even worse, they had never before seen their mothers naked."

While most stopped menstruating during their incarceration, some didn't. There was no paper or any other supplies to keep clean. Pregnancies were aborted, or the newborns killed. There was forced sterilization of both Jews and Gypsies.

Even though women are generally physically weaker than men, they were forced to do the same work as men, from operating huge rollers to pave roads to carrying heavy bales of carpets or clothing.

Some got supposedly lighter work at the Siemens Electrical company, making parts for war machinery. This was not for compassionate reasons, Saidel stressed – it was simply because their smaller fingers could make the more delicate rocket parts.

Rape, by drunken SS men and later occasionally by the Russian liberators, was not uncommon, although, she noted, "it always happened to someone else, never to [the survivor who was talking to me]."

Saidel was told about bordellos, run by former prostitutes who had been arrested for "asocial behaviour." Their clients, by the way, were not. Some of the prisoners had prostitution as their jobs. They were sent to the men's camps, where certain male prisoners had access to them.

Saidel said that while male homosexuals were imprisoned for their behaviour, under an 1871 German law forbidding it, lesbians were not.

She believes that there must have been nurturing lesbian relationships at Ravensbrück, but there are no first- or second- person accounts.

At the end of the war, Saidel said, several thousand of the surviving women were taken for treatment to Sweden.

Richler's widow approved biographer's warts-and-all portrait

BY BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Reporter talked with 150 people for the project

When Michael Posner began his oral biography of Mordecai Richler, his plan was to assemble a collection of entertaining anecdotes about the legendary Montreal writer, but he soon realized that psychological insights about Richler would produce a more revealing portrait.

"When I began to do the interviews, I thought, 'This could be more than just anecdotes – it could aim at a certain level of analysis by those who knew him best,'" Posner told The CJN before his recent appearance at the Jewish Book Fair. "If it was only anecdotes, I think it would have been a little less interesting."

The Globe and Mail arts reporter eventually spoke with 150 "extraordinary" people for the project, including Florence Richler and the five Richler children. The novelist's widow had generously given him her blessing for the book. "You've got to do a warts-and-all portrait, and anything less than that does no service," Posner said. "I think Florence recognized that and she said, 'Go ahead.' I think I was really fortunate."

Published earlier this year, The Last Honest Man: Mordecai Richler, An Oral Biography (McClelland and Stewart) has garnered critical acclaim for its multifaceted portrait of Richler that reveals both his public and private sides and highlights his endearing qualities but does not whitewash his flaws.

Clearly Richler had a dark side, as evidenced by his decades-long avoidance of his mother and brother, heavy drinking and rare instances of unfriendly behaviour. But the scales are easily tipped in the opposite direction by revelations of his many good deeds, his essentially kind and gentle nature and, of course, his outstanding literary talent and sterling wit. (Regarding his brief first marriage to a wife who later took a marked turn in life, he once remarked, "How bad a husband could I have been if she became a Buddhist nun?")

What emerges is a strong and compellingly readable portrait that should prove of immense value to future biographers as well as fans of this larger-than-life literary figure whose satirical swipes at Jewish crassness were as famous as his stinging jabs at Quebec separatists.

It was precisely because of his willingness to step into Canada's fractious unity debate that Richler was embraced as a beloved national icon across Canada, Posner found. "I was really struck by the enormous outpouring of grief after his death from ordinary Canadians, many of whom I suspect may never have read a Mordecai novel," he said. "We lost Timothy Findley a few years ago and Robertson Davies a few years before that, and Carol Shields more recently, and there were wonderful tributes and eulogies for each of them, but somehow the grief for Mordecai Richler surpassed all that.

"I think somehow it was not the novels [that magnified Richler's popular appeal] but the journalism and the political courage he demonstrated by taking on Quebec nationalism."

Richler's characteristic impulse to unmask hypocrisy wherever he found it was not a quality he acquired late in life, according to the Winnipeg-born Posner, who once shook Richler's hand as a student at the University of Manitoba in the mid-'60s.

"There's a real pattern. It doesn't come to him late in life. It was his instinct. That was the man."

As some of the anecdotes demonstrate, Richler could sometimes be "moralistic and judgmental" with his close friends, Posner said. "He had flaws, but I emerged with more respect for his work ethic. And to be fair, the moralism was tempered by his marvellous sense of humour."

Although he knew it was risky, Posner forwarded a copy of the manuscript to Florence Richler as a courtesy. She later phoned with a few corrections and told him she found the book "very fair and balanced."

"That's as much as I could hope for," he said.

Posner, a former managing editor of the Financial Times and former Washington correspondent for Maclean's, said that the Richler project was fun from start to end, except for the task of transcribing the taped interviews and the difficult duty of cutting more than 50 manuscript pages before publication.

Are there still areas of Richler's life that will likely reap more new material for future biographers?

"The relationship with the mother – that will be worth probing more. There are some private letters that are still off limits to researchers and some, I imagine, were sent from her to Mordecai and from Mordecai to her. Some, I imagine, are less than totally flattering."

שרון והתנתקות

אם יש משהו שעושה אותי חולה ממש זה ישראלים שבחרו לחיות כאן, אך בגלגול עיניים ובהתחסדות אומרים "מה עשו לנו מהארץ הנפלאה שהיתה שם". קודם כל-אם היא היתה לכם כל כך נפלאה-לא הייתם נמצאים כאן. ישראל לא היתה נפלאה אף פעם. מימיה הראשונים של ההסתדרות היו שחיתויות. אפשר למנות מליון דברים עקומים שהיו שם. אבל כל זה ממש לא חשוב; זה תביעת היחיד שיש לרבים מאיתנו, יש שם דברים נפלאים ויש שם דברים קשים. זכותכם לחיות איפה שאתם רוצים, אבל אין לכם זכות להוציא את דיבת הארץ. שמעתי אפילו ישראלי אחד שטען שהוא נמצא פה" בגלל שלטון הליכוד", כשכל העולם יודע שהוא נמצא כאן כי חיפה לו הזדמנות כלכלית מצויינת שהפכה אותו לאיש עשיר.

Kosher poultry strike entering third month

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – An almost two-month-old strike at the Jewish community's sole kosher chicken supplier, Marvid (Volailles), has resulted in continued uncertainty over the poultry supply despite recent efforts to make up for the shortage.

"It's been very difficult," said Avi Brook, owner of the Cote St. Luc Kosher Meat Market. "We don't have enough."

The strike by about 100 poultry workers at the northeast-end plant began Sept. 13, just prior to the start of the High Holy Days, and there is no sign of its letting up.

The strikers, members of the Confédération des syndicats nationaux (CSN), are seeking improved working conditions and wages.

Brook, whose family has owned the butcher shop for 50 years, was forced to tell customers during the holidays, and occasionally since then, that he had no chickens left. "I turned customers away."

In a rare move last week, the city's main kosher certification body, the Jewish Community Council of Montreal, or Vaad Ha'ir, began to allow suppliers from outside Montreal – most prominently the U.S-based Empire Kosher Poultry – to bring kosher chickens into the city as a way to cope with the shortage.

Normally, the Vaad forbids the importation of kosher meats other than its own to its MK-certified butcher shops and grocery stores, which risk losing their hechsher if they do not comply.

"We have allowed establishments under our supervision to bring in chickens from outside Montreal, provided their kosher certification is approved by ourselves," said Vaad executive director Rabbi Saul Emanuel.

"Marvid continues to supply the market. There were some shortages on certain days, but the situation is now improved," Rabbi Emanuel said.

Murray Steinberg, a local agent for Toronto-based Chai Poultry, is refusing to agree to the Vaad's offer, since it is his understanding that it will end once the strike does or even earlier.

"It would cost me too much to do it that way," said Murray, who imports frozen Chai products for local Costcos and for kosher establishments not under the MK.

"What I would really like to see is a free and open market," he told The CJN.

Moshe Friedman, Marvid's owner and president, said additional poultry supplied by Empire would bring the supply back up to 100 per cent from the current 75, but declined to be quoted on any other issue related to Marvid's problems unless he could vet the article first.

Brook said the importing of meat from the United States would only work as a stopgap measure. "They'll come from the U.S., but you can be sure they won't come more than once a week. There will be no way to get [a new supply] on a daily basis.

"It will work for a short period, but this is not a solution."

Prior to the strike, Brook said, his store sold about 400 chickens a week, which was reduced to 240 after the labour troubles began and before Empire began to ship in poultry. Marvid processed about 20,000 chickens weekly before the strike.

Because it's a union shop, Marvid has tried to cope with its reduced production by bringing in volunteer workers, but that has not fully made up for the absence of its regular workers.

The CSN, in a claim before the provincial labour commission, characterized the volunteers as replacement workers.

Marvid's lawyer, Joel Weitzman, told The CJN that according to his sources, he expected the commission to rule that the volunteer workers have indeed been volunteers, not strikebreakers. Marvid is also seeking an injunction in Quebec Superior Court challenging the number of picketers and their location around the plant, Weitzman said.

Brook said he hopes the strike ends soon because in his opinion, it could threaten Marvid's survival as a business.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko, a longtime critic of the Vaad's banning of imported kosher meat, said he hopes the relaxation of the rule during the strike will become permanent.

"I hope they will finally embrace the realities of the marketplace."

REMEMBERING TWO YEARS LATER...REMEMBERING YOU...
WE WILL NEVER FORGET

"Wherever people gather, her deeds will speak her praise."

BOOK OF PROVERBS

Our darling Lisa, it's been two years since your life was tragically taken on that terrible night in November, and yet we remain in shock and are still filled with grief and sorrow, are still in disbelief and horror over what a monstrous being did to you. Your beautiful spirit guides us still; your kind and loving heart continues to surround us and helps us in our effort to go on living. But living without you has been so hard, Lis, so very, very painful and hard. There have been many dark mornings, afternoons, and nights, many sad holidays, many difficult times. We miss you so deeply. There is such profound pain surrounding your death. Its neverendingness is intolerable. Only by remembering the great joy you brought to everyone whose life you touched, your countless kind deeds and thoughtful caring ways, your love of life, your positive attitude, your integrity and honest hard work, your sense of fair play and loyalty, your grace and courage, your fun-loving spirit, and your everlasting sunshine smile and laughter, are we able to go on.

You were such good company and you brought so much comfort, enjoyment, and happiness to all of us, but most especially to our mom. There are no words to describe how she longs for you every minute of every day, and the pain and devastation that losing you has brought to her...has brought to all of us. We will never understand how someone could be so vicious and evil to have savagely attacked you and ended your life in this way. Who and what will prevent this from happening again to another innocent and vulnerable human being?

How many more parents will have to bury a daughter or son because a community has failed to protect them from the monsters who freely walk our streets? How many more hearts and families does this community want to see broken?

We pray to God to give us strength and to continue to watch over, protect, and bless your precious, gentle soul. We pray that your pain is now softened, and that you know our love for you is endless and our thoughts are always with you. You are still, and will always be, an essential and enormously cherished part of our family and of each of our lives. Without you, our family can never be whole again; there is a gaping space among us that can never be filled. You are still, and will always be, our shining star and beacon in the night. If only, if only, if only...

Lis, we love you and miss you always and forever.

Love, Mom, Steve, Kim, Jeff, Helen, your loving nieces and nephew, dear family, and devoted friends and colleagues.

Canada will not waver in its support of Israel: Martin

Hershell Ezrin, CIJA's chief executive officer, estimated that from 150 to 160 parliamentarians – MPs and senators – attended the dinner and said he thought that "there were more members of Parliament involved in our event than in any other event in Ottawa except for the opening of the House."

The dinner was the celebratory culmination of a two-day conference in Ottawa called Democracy in Action.

The conference was effectively the launch of CIJA, the Jewish community's national umbrella advocacy and educational agency formed earlier in the year.

Hundreds of participants were part of the large contingent that participated in the two-day conference.

Coming from across Canada, the participants, including members of the CIJA-Public Affairs Committee, an independent membership-based organization promoting involvement in the Canadian democratic process, descended on the nation's capital for hands-on training in the fundamentals of participatory democracy and political activism. The conference included meetings with members of parliament and government officials, a reception with Israel's ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker, and an address by noted British historian Sir Martin Gilbert.

Speakers at the parliamentary dinner emphasized the common democratic values shared by Canada and Israel.

Harper referred to the Jewish state as a "model of democratic engagement" in which the "values of democracy are defended heroically every single day."

The dinner featured a special tribute to former Quebec premier Lucien Bouchard, former Ontario premiers Mike Harris and Bob Rae, and former Newfoundland premier Brian Tobin. The former provincial premiers were honoured and recognized by CIJA "for their steadfast support for Israel and enduring friendship to the Jewish community."

Steven Cummings, co-chair of CIJA, said that "these were two extraordinary days in which the Jewish community came of age in engaging as Canadians in the political process. It is imperative for the community to be involved in order to ensure the quality of life for themselves and all Canadians."

In his keynote address, journalist and CBC broadcaster Rex Murphy stated that "the fact that the goals and ideals of democracy are maintained in Israel is a beacon in itself."

He expressed amazement at the seeming ease with which any catastrophe in the world can be blamed on Israel. "This is all code for a real old story that every person in this room knows better than I."

According to Ezrin, the purpose of the conference was three-fold: to explain to participants about the new advocacy structure of CIJA; to establish new relationships with parliamentarians; and to communicate issues of concern and interest to the Jewish community. "I think we were able to have an impact in all of those areas," he said.

CIJA co-chair Brent Belzberg enthused over the broad community participation in the conference. "The Jewish community through CIJA was able to communicate one on one with politicians throughout the day and 550 people from across the country were given that opportunity. Our politicians were available, beyond that which anyone might have expected."

Lawrence Hart, national president of Maccabi Canada and the chair of the community relations committee of the Canada Israel Committee was "impressed with the enormous scope and depth of the conference," which he said "eloquently demonstrated the community's commitment to and involvement in the political process of our country."

Georganne Burke, a CIJA-PAC member from Toronto, was part of the 25-person group that met with the New Democratic Party parliamentary caucus during the weekend. She said the exchange with the MPs was civil and very instructive. "I believe very strongly in grassroots politics," she told The CJN. "What I saw in Ottawa was the beginning of a real grassroots political effort in the community. I loved seeing regular people getting out and talking to their parliamentarians."

CIJA oversees advocacy and educational initiatives for its constituent organizations: Canadian Jewish Congress, Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec Israel Committee and National Jewish Campus Life. CIJA is supported through the United Israel Appeal Federated Communities by federations and regional communities across Canada.

AIDS a human rights issue, UN special envoy says

By MARTIN ZEILIG
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Canada needs a museum of human rights and the children of the late Israel Asper are doing his memory proud by continuing his efforts to have one built in Winnipeg, Stephen Lewis says.

"We have a personal responsibility to the world community. A museum of human rights will flourish here," Lewis, the UN secretary general's special envoy for HIV/AIDS in Africa and a former Canadian ambassador to the United Nations, told some 300 people at the Jewish Historical Society of Western Canada's Double Chai Gala Banquet.

The event, marking the society's 36th anniversary, was held Oct. 31 at Winnipeg's Etz Chayim Synagogue.

Lewis, who once served as deputy director of UNICEF and as leader of the Ontario New Democratic Party, devoted his keyote address to "Canada's role in addressing human rights violations on the global stage."

"The agenda of Canada and human rights was always seen as political," he said, pointing to this country's stand on human rights abuses in such places as Chile, El Salvador and Guatemala, as well as its position against the former apartheid regime in South Africa.

"We still see the issue in a political sense."

But Canada has also violated human rights in the past, he noted.

"This country has had a dreadful record on aboriginal human rights," said Lewis, citing the imposition of the War Measures Act by former prime minister Pierre Trudeau during the October Crisis in 1970 as another black mark.

"You can't be an exponent of human rights if you don't preserve them in your own land."

But talk of human rights is academic when whole countries are being devastated by the scourge of AIDS, said Lewis, who had returned to North America from Africa the previous day.

To illustrate the AIDS problem, he described a series of council homes he visited in Malawi for 700 children who had lost their parents to the disease.

"There were 75 grandmothers, all in their late 60s to 80s, looking after the kids. They were desperately hungry and the children were in tatters," he said.

"The world has gone mad in 2004. A corner of the planet is caught in a ferocious pandemic and the world replies with passivity," said Lewis, noting that there are 14 million orphans in sub-Saharan Africa because of AIDS.

"The grandparents bury their children and look after their grandchildren," It's painful to see how they're struggling. I came away thinking 'What's all this talk about human rights?' Rights are being destroyed right across the board in daily survival."

He said UN conventions on the rights of women and children are meaningless because of AIDS.

"Human rights has to deal with the decimation of the human family," said Lewis, adding that India and Russia also have huge numbers of people infected with HIV/AIDS.

He said the Millennium Development Goals, agreed to by all 191 UN member states in 2000, are elusive for most nations in the world.

The goals, which are supposed to be achieved by 2015, are to eradicate extreme poverty and hunger, achieve universal primary education, promote gender equality and empower women, reduce child mortality, improve maternal health, and combat HIV/AIDS, malaria and other diseases.

"It's almost Darwinian the way women are infected with AIDS," Lewis said.

He noted that $25 billion – a small amount compared to the $200 billion spent on the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, or total worldwide military expenditures – would go a long way toward helping people with HIV/AIDS and other preventable diseases.

"People love Canada. A voice like Canada's is desperately needed," Lewis said. "Human rights is not merely voting, ethnicity and social justice. It's also a matter of health, education and poverty reduction."

Bin Laden apologia aired on CBC

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The videotape of Osama bin Laden that was broadcast Oct. 29 on Al-Jazeera, in which he admitted responsibility for the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, has produced a few astounding reactions. Writing on the eve of the U.S. presidential election, Margaret Wente in the Globe and Mail ("Forget it, Jake: It's the West Coast," Nov. 2) reflected on the peculiar political mood she has found in British Columbia. Some people there, she wrote, think Osama sounded like a reasonable man the other day. Why not reach out a hand to find some common ground?"

That view was expressed by Eric Margolis, contributing foreign editor to the Toronto Sun, in an Oct. 29 interview with Peter Mansbridge on CBC's The National.

Margolis remarked on bin Laden's "more modulated tone, less rhetorical, more negotiating… it seems almost like an olive branch or a more conciliatory tone than he usually makes, saying 'Stop attacking us, we'll stop attacking you… It's what you're doing in the Middle East that has caused us to react. We are not your enemies.'"

Having put bin Laden's remarks in what might be called a Canadian context (while failing to mention that this country is Number 5 on Al Qaeda's hit list) Margolis concluded: "This is a more moderate bin Laden than we've heard in the past."

Mansbridge asked, "And why would that be? Why would he feel more moderate now?"

Margolis replied: "Because he feels that perhaps with a new American president coming in that there will be a change of American policy in the Middle East. However, he has said in the past that there's very little difference between the parties, the mainstream parties, the mainstream candidates."

So which is it? Is bin Laden prepared to extend an "olive branch" to the Americans because he favours the Democrats over the Republicans? Did he really care who would win the U.S. presidency?

Mansbridge did remind Margolis that bin Laden said "whether it's Kerry or Bush won't make any difference to your security."

Margolis agreed, but argued that bin Laden "has often said in the past that the Republican and Democratic parties are completely in the thrall of various interest groups… the only way he can change American policy is by appealing directly to the American public, and [that] the only thing the American public understands in this case is financial pain. That's why he's made a point of attacking financial targets and causing huge financial damage to the U.S. as he mentioned [in the tape]."

What Margolis omitted to say was that bin Laden has accused "the Jews" of taking control of the U.S. economy and the media "and they now control all aspects of your life," (as he wrote in his "Letter to the American People," carried in full in the Observer, Nov. 24, 2002).

Margolis is often highly critical of the United States, and his columns are sometimes tinged with conspiracy theories. But with this apologia for bin Laden, Margolis has reached a new low.

Margolis has, in effect, joined the chorus that blames the United States itself for the terrorist acts of 9/11.

His refusal to acknowledge bin Laden's evil was brazen, even shocking. But we have seen such expressions of abject appeasement in the face of evil before.

Let us be clear: bin Laden is not fighting for liberal democracy or a more just economic order. Indeed he has repeatedly complained that the United States is robbing his people of their wealth. He wants to impose a strict Islamic theocracy on us all – what the writer Christopher Hitchens has termed a "vicious theocratic fascism."

"Only a complete moral idiot can believe for an instant that [in fighting bin Laden] we are fighting against the wretched of the earth," is how Hitchens once put it in his inimitable but – in this case – necessary bluntness (Boston Globe, Aug. 9, 2002).

New shaliach wants 'to spread love of Zionism and Israel'

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Jonny Cline, the new executive director of the Winnipeg Zionist Initiative (WZI), sees himself as an educational resource.

"My aim is to spread the love of Zionism and Israel throughout the Jewish community," he said in an interview. "The role of the WZI in the community is changing. We are at a different stage in the life of the community. Liat [Arieh, his predecessor] and I have different skills. I am not going to try to do what she did. I am ready to take the WZI to the next level."

The three-year-old Winnipeg Zionist Initiative was one of the many initiatives begun by the late businessman and philanthropist Israel Asper. Arieh, its first executive director, built the organization from scratch, forming student and adult branches, a media watchdog group and a pro-Israel university newspaper, as well as bringing in high profile pro-Israel speakers in conjunction with the Asper Foundation.

Arieh and her family returned to Israel in May. Cline and his family arrived in Winnipeg in late August.

The new shaliach is originally from Manchester, England. His family, he says, has been in England for several generations. His father is a businessman, his mother an optician.

Cline grew up in the Bnei Akiva movement. As a teenager, he was a teacher at the North Manchester Jewish Teenage Centre. He has also served as national chair of the National Jewish Youth Assembly of Great Britain and Ireland, and served as a consultant for the Glasgow Jewish Teenage Centre.

At 18, he went to Israel for the first time under the auspices of Bnei Akiva's Hachshara program. "After three months, I called home and told my parents that I was staying in Israel," Cline said.

He enlisted in the Israel Defence Forces, serving in the Nahal Brigade. After army duty, he enrolled in Bar Ilan University. On graduation in 2000, with a degree in psychology, he went to work in the high tech sector for a year or so.

"While a career in high tech looked promising," Cline said, "I was dissatisfied. I felt empty. I took six months off and then decided to go to work in the public sector."

From August 2001 to January 2002, Cline was the official spokesperson for the West Bank town of Ariel. He heaps praise on Ariel's longtime mayor, Ron Nachman.

"Ron is a visionary who backs up his words with deeds," Cline says. "Twenty years ago, there were just 40 families in Ariel. Ron envisaged what Ariel has become. He even determined where the main institutions would be built. He has built a beautiful city."

From January 2002 to last April, Cline served as regional youth co-ordinator and project manager for the Shomron Regional Council.

The Winnipeg posting is his first career stop in North America. In his new role, he said, one of his first projects will be to create a new interactive Web portal that provides information on services and programs.

"I will also be taking the lead on all programs related to Israel," he added.

He is looking forward to working closely with the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, although the WZI remains independent of the federation.

"I love Canada," Cline said. "Here, just like in Israel, you can be who you are."

After Arafat, Gaza could become more of a tinderbox

By DANNY RUBINSTEIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

One of the last instructions that Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat gave from his sickbed as he was leaving for Paris was to the chair of the Palestinian Legislative Council, Ruhi Fatuh, asking him to attempt an immediate reconciliation between Rashid Abu Shabak, head of the PA's preventive security services in Gaza, and Mussa Arafat, head of public security and military intelligence in the Strip. The two did, in fact, meet last weekend for a kind of reconciliation. But many doubt whether it was of much value.

At the same time, one of the first acts of Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Queria – after he received operational powers – was to leave on Saturday for Gaza to meet with representatives of the various factions there, foremost among them Hamas, as well as with the head of the security services.

Arafat's order, and the meetings in Gaza, were carried out in light of the great fear of members of the Palestinian leadership that in the president's absence, chances are great that Gaza will become the source of trouble. The distress there is well known. It is much greater than in the West Bank. In Gaza, there is terrible unemployment, egregious poverty and widespread destruction of neighbourhoods and agricultural lands in the northern part, in the area of the Jewish settlement of Netzarim, in Khan Yunis and, above all, in Rafah.

Although the opposition groups in Gaza – Hamas and Islamic Jihad – don't have many armed activists, they have very broad public support. In polls taken in Gaza, they have more support there than the Palestinian ruling party, the Fatah movement.

Fatah in Gaza is divided, and the split is expressed in harsh competition between the heads of the security services. Often, they conduct real battles among themselves. They shoot, they murder, they kidnap, they take over offices and headquarters. At their disposal are local gangs: the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, the Abu Rish Brigade, the Abu Samadana gangs, and the Popular Resistance Committees. Fatah activists in Gaza also have strong feelings of deprivation when it comes to receiving top positions in the institutions of the Palestine Liberation Organization and the PA.

Two of Fatah's founders, who were also Arafat's deputies, Khalil al-Wazir and Salah Khalaf, were from Gaza. They were also both killed in Tunis – al-Wazir in an Israeli attack in 1988, Khalaf in his office in 1991. Arafat himself is from the Al-Kidwa family, which is well-known in Gaza and Khan Yunis. Without the three of them, and mainly, of course, without Arafat, Gaza's relative representation in the Palestinian leadership is quite meagre.

However, the main concern about what will happen in Gaza without the PA president stems from the fact that until now, Arafat served as a balancing factor in the struggle between the heads of the services in Gaza. Without him, major unrest could develop there.

This is not just about a personal quarrel between senior officials, such as Mohammed Dahlan and Mussa Arafat, which can be solved by a meeting over a cup of coffee. This is a serious struggle for power, in which each of the parties has allies and provides services that thousands of families earn their living from. They are competing for positions, for budgets, for profits from the gangs of smugglers in the Rafah tunnels, as well as for the distribution of monetary donations from around the world and for control of economic enterprises and public institutions.

Arafat also served to a large extent as a balancing factor in connection with activities in the West Bank, all PLO institutions, as well as the PA and the Fatah movement. But because of the distress in Gaza, the effect of the quarrels and the competition among its political groups is much more serious.

The outbreak of violent riots in Gaza could also influence Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's disengagement plan. Riots there will provide ammunition to the plan's opponents, who will certainly try to postpone the withdrawal until it becomes clear who will govern Gaza.

In any case, the problems caused by Arafat's absence are liable to start in Gaza.

Knesset vote fraud?

Likud MK Yehiel Hazan will face criminal charges of aggravated forgery, fraud and breach of trust after he allegedly voted twice when the Knesset considered the Emergency Economical program bill in May 2003. The indictment states that after he cast his own electronic vote, Hazan also voted in the place of fellow Likud MK Inbal Gavrieli, who sits next to him but was absent from the plenum at the time.

Barak is back

Ehud Barak announced that he was returning to Israeli politics. "I intend to run for the leadership of the Labor Party and lead it back to power," Israel Radio quoted Barak as telling Shimon Peres, the current Labor chief, last week. Barak, 62, a former prime minister and military chief of staff, withdrew from politics after losing the premiership to Ariel Sharon in 2001. His term in the top office is remembered for Israel's withdrawal from southern Lebanon and for attempts to reach peace deals with Syria and the Palestinian Authority. Detractors accuse Barak of ruining Labor with his governing style.

Brothers in arms

Two Palestinian brothers who planned to carry out a suicide attack turned themselves in to Israeli forces. The military allowed publication Monday of the surrender, saying the would-be terrorists from the Ein Beit Ilma refugee camp in the West Bank cited family pressure as the reason for their change of heart. Israeli security experts say the policy of demolishing terrorists' family homes deters future attacks.

First reading of compensation bill

The Knesset gave preliminary approval to payments for Jews agreeing to evacuate their homes in Gaza and four West Bank settlements. By a 64-44 vote with 9 abstentions, the Knesset passed the first of three votes on compensation packages expected to give hundreds of thousands of dollars to each family of the 8,800 settlers in Gaza and parts of the West Bank. The compensation bill now goes to a legislative committee and must pass two more votes before becoming law.

Carmel Market victims

The three Israelis killed in the Carmel Market bombing last week were Shmuel Levy, 65, from Jaffa, Leah Levin, 64, from Givatayim and Tatiana Ackerman, 32, from Tel Aviv. Many of the 33 people injured in the attack are still in serious condition.

Israeli team scores victory

An Israeli soccer team earned its first victory in a prestigious European tournament. Maccabi Tel Aviv scored an historic 2-1 win over Ajax Amsterdam to notch its first Champions League points.

PA leaders fly to Paris

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian leaders abruptly cancelled and then rescheduled a trip to Paris on Monday to check on the condition of Yasser Arafat, after Arafat's wife publicly accused them of seeking to "bury alive" the ailing Palestinian Authority chairman, a Palestinian official said Monday.

The former head of the Palestinian National Security, Mohammed Dahlan, said that Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia, Palestinian Liberation Organization Secretary General Mahmoud Abbas and Palestinian Foreign Minister Nabil Sha'ath would leave the West Bank for Jordan on Monday and head to Paris on Tuesday to visit Arafat.

"There is no change of plan. The delegation is going to Paris," said Dahlan.

A senior official said the delegation was expected in Paris Monday night and they would meet senior French officials on Tuesday to discuss Arafat's medical condition.

In what she called "an appeal to the Palestinian people," broadcast live by the pan-Arab network, Suha Arafat accused Palestinian officials on their way to Paris of conspiring to usurp the role her husband has held for four decades as Palestinian leader.

"Let it be known to the honest Palestinian people that a bunch of those who want to inherit are coming to Paris," she screamed in Arabic over the telephone.

"You have to realize the size of the conspiracy. I tell you they are trying to bury Abu Ammar alive," she continued, using Arafat's nom de guerre. "He is all right and he is going home. God is great."

She said she was calling from Arafat's bedside at the French military hospital, where the 75-year-old leader has been in intensive care since last week.

Tayeb Abdel Rahim, a senior Arafat aide, said the trip by the West Bank leaders had been called off to protest her comments. "They are angry with Suha and don't want to go," he said at a news conference in Ramallah.

"What came from Suha doesn't represent our people," he said, accusing Mrs. Arafat of "wanting to destroy the Palestinian leadership's decision and to be the lone decision maker."

Senior Palestinian officials met in Ramallah in an attempt to send a delegation to Paris, despite the opposition of Suha Arafat. Among those meeting are the three leaders whose planned trip was called off at the last moment, following Arafat's wife's outburst.

Palestinian cabinet minister Saeb Erekat said the cabinet and PLO leadership would meet later Monday. "We hope to put this ordeal behind us," he said.

With Arafat clinging to life, Mrs. Arafat has been one of a handful of people to see her husband and has tightly controlled information on his condition. Palestinian officials have grumbled that Mrs. Arafat, who has spent the past three years living in France, has gained too much power.

"It's an absurd situation that Suha is sitting there and deciding when, how and who," deputy Palestinian cabinet minister Sufian Abu Zaida told Army Radio. "This is a woman who hasn't seen her husband for three years. It is bizarre that at the end of his days, his wife decides who enters and who does not."

"Yasser Arafat is not the private property of Suha Arafat," Abu Zaida continued. Abdel Rahim said Arafat "does not belong to a small family but to the entire Palestinian nation."

Sources in the defence establishment believe that Tuesday would be the day on which the Palestinians would ask to disconnect Arafat from life support and announce his death.

Tuesday night marked Lailat al-Kader, the night Muslims believe God revealed the Koran to the prophet Mohammed. The death of the Palestinian leader on that day would, therefore, be symbolic.

The three Palestinian leaders have made intensive efforts to meet French President Jacques Chirac and Foreign Minister Michel Barnier to discuss the situation and make funeral arrangements.

The trio was to first visit the Percy Military Hospital in Paris for first-hand information on Arafat's medical condition. Palestinian sources have admitted in recent days that Arafat's mental state is irreversible. However, there are doubts about his physical condition.

Arafat spent a fifth day in intensive care on Sunday. According to unconfirmed reports, the hospital had pronounced Arafat's death already on Saturday evening.

Earlier Sunday, one of his senior aides, Nabil Abu Rudeineh, denied Arafat was in a coma, after visiting the hospital where the Palestinian leader has been undergoing treatment for more than a week.

But Palestinian Foreign Minister Nabil Sha'ath later told CNN that Arafat was in a "reversible" coma. He denied reports that there was brain or liver damage.

Qureia and Abbas, Arafat's deputy in the Palestine Liberation Organization, have been working together to run Palestinian affairs in Arafat's absence and to prevent chaos and violence should the Palestinian leader die.

Mohammed Dahlan, a former Gaza security chief, arrived in the West Bank from France with a message for the leaders from Arafat's wife, Suha, one of the few people with access to the ailing leader. After nightfall Sunday, Dahlan met with Abbas.

Police inspector general Moshe Karadi said Sunday that the police are preparing with the Israel Defence Forces to safeguard Arafat's funeral. "We do not anticipate anything untoward as a result of Arafat's passing away," Karadi said.

Asked about possible riots during the prayers at Temple Mount following Arafat's death, Karadi said he hopes the worshippers act with restraint and responsibility, as they have been doing so far.

On Sunday, Hamas and Islamic Jihad sources began attacking Abbas and Qureia personally and undermining their legitimacy as leaders of the Palestinian cause. Apparently the groups' real demand is for the immediate formation of a joint leadership representing all the organizations that will make immediate decisions until elections are held in the territories.

A Hamas spokesman said after Qureia's departure that "we must set up a joint national leadership to make decisions until elections are held. What was permitted to Yasser Arafat is forbidden to others and we must not let interested parties in the PA and PLO control Palestinian destiny. Arafat derived his authority from being a symbol, but others don't have that privilege."

Mysteries multiply over missing monies

By ARNON REGULAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — As Yasser Arafat's medical condition has deteriorated, rumours have multiplied concerning funds that were previously under his control and that various elements in the Palstinian Authority (PA) are trying to locate.

Reports have also abounded about a power struggle between Arafat's wife, Suha, and his financial adviser, Mohammed Rashid, who is in Paris.

A conservative estimate of the total sum held by Arafat in various places around the world is about $1 billion (all funds US), largely based on monies that were taken out of the territories and withdrawn from PA accounts between 1995 and 2000.

The International Monetary Fund (IMF) reviewed PA accounts and, in particular, the activity of the Palestinian Commercial Services Co. (PCSC) – Rashid's main agency, which oversaw cement, tobacco and building supplies monopolies. The resulting IMF report suggested that $897.6 million accrued by the PCSC and its offshoots during those years was spirited out of the Palestinian treasury and transferred to mysterious accounts throughout 1999.

All attempts to trace that money have been unsuccessful, but several months after the IMF report was written in mid-2003, a French prosecutor launched an inquiry into suspicions of money-laundering involving accounts belonging to Suha Arafat in France and Switzerland. She claimed the investigation stemmed from information given to the French authorities by "the Sharon government."

The bottom line is that the investigation continued, but its results are not known. The sum discovered in her accounts totalled $11.5 million.

According to the IMF report, West Bank and Gaza: Economic Performance and Reform under Conflict, when the PA was hit by a recession at the beginning of the intifadah, particularly after Israel stopped transferring taxes it had collected, about $119 million was returned to the PA's current operating account, but the remaining funds, about $778 million, disappeared.

International officials, especially those from countries that donate funds to the PA, demanded that Arafat return the money to the PA's account, particularly following criticism within the donor countries over lax supervision of the PA's accounts during the Oslo years, and in view of Israel's charge that donations were being used to finance terrorist activity.

The money transferred to mystery accounts is apparently not the only sum that Arafat moved outside the territories. The IMF report explicitly states that the allegedly smuggled sums do not include the PA's income from taxes, of which no record has been found, nor investments that Rashid made exclusively outside the territories. Additional monies that may have gone missing from PA accounts derive from various taxes levied on PA bureaucrats throughout the years.

In the case of the Karin A ship (seized in 2002 on its way to PA territories laden with weapons), at least, it is known that the ship's purchase was handled by the treasurer of the Palestinian security forces, Fuad Shubaki, who is in detention in Jericho, but it is unclear where the millions of dollars came from to buy the weapons in Iran.

Additionally, the money that disappeared does not include the income of the PA monopolies from the beginning of the intifadah to the end of 2003, when they were placed under the Palestine Investment Fund (PIF), which belongs to the PA and is headed by Finance Minister Salam Fayyad.

Rashid served until two weeks ago as a member of the PIF's board of directors and was active on all its committees. Immediately after the news of Arafat's declining health was announced, Rashid resigned from this fund, which consolidates investments he made over the years. The fund was set up at the behest of the donor countries, which demanded sweeping reforms and brought in international accounting firms to audit Rashid's assets.

The fund reported holdings as of December 2003 that were worth $799 million. The sums in the fund are under the ongoing supervision of Fayyad and its board of directors, and cannot be withdrawn without the board's consent.

Other questions concerning assets and monies held by Arafat remain, with respect to accounts that the PLO and Fatah operate separately from other PA accounts. The extent and origins of the money in these accounts have never been fully ascertained.

Holocaust Compensation

In recent negotiations, the German government agreed that Holocaust survivors who had lived under illegality or with a false identity or false papers for a period of 18 months may, if they fulfill other criteria, be eligible for a pension under the Article 2 Fund.

In another amendment to the existing criteria, survivors who were incarcerated in a recognized labor camp in Bulgaria may now be eligible for a pension under the Article 2 Fund and should contact their local office for further details of this amendment to the existing criteria.

Survivors currently receiving a pension from the German Government (under the BEG) are not eligible. Current income will also determine eligibility.

If an application has already been submitted for the Article 2 Fund, it is not necessary to re-apply.

Officials from Manitoba build bonds with Israel

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Manitoba health officials signed two health-related memorandums of understanding with Israelis during a recent week-long tour of the country.

Among the 90 Manitoba participants on the trip, organized by the Jewish Federation of Manitoba, United Israel Appeal (UIA) Canada and Keren Hayesod, were Deputy Minister of Health Milt Sussman and president of the Winnipeg Regional Health Authority Dr. Brian Postl, as well as leading members of Manitoba's business and Jewish communities.

During the trip, which ended on Sunday, civil servants signed one memorandum related to development of medical emergency simulation technology. Another was signed with an Israeli medical software company.

"They have developed one of the most universal and comprehensive software systems that apply to medical technology, that officials with the Health Department have ever seen," said mission participant Dave Chomiak, Manitoba's former minister of health and current minister of energy, science and technology.

But Chomiak was most interested in his visit to a large wind farm in the Golan Heights.

"They are using [a new kind of] technology on wind farms in Israel," Chomiak said. "That was really the highlight [for me], since we are involved in wind farm technology back home."

This kind of new alliance was the mission's main objective, said tour organizer Bob Freedman, CEO of the Manitoba Jewish Federation. "This mission has not only resulted in a level of goodwill being generated between representatives of Canada and Israel. Some of the professionals we have brought have also discovered business and investment opportunities in Israel."

Freedman, who also organized the first mixed Jewish-Christian, business-oriented mission to Israel from Manitoba in 2002, said the province's Jewish federation is particularly well-positioned to organize trips involving the participation of outsiders to the Jewish community.

"A few years ago, we started reaching out beyond the Jewish community to our non-Jewish friends," he said, adding that whether local political leaders have been Liberal, Conservative or NDP, all have maintained a solid relationship with Manitoba's Jewish community.

He attributes the close relationship partly to the fact that the federation is organized differently from most other federations, in that it is the federation itself that represents the Jewish community, rather than Congress.

"The federation is the face of the Jewish community and this has resulted in the establishment of very good relationships with our political leadership and members of our business community," he said.

But Jewish participant Guy Kroft, a judge in the Manitoba Court of Appeal, said one of the mission's most marked successes is exposing first-time visitors to real life in Israel.

"Most people come [to Israel] expecting that every place is going to be a war zone. Most impressions about what life in Israel is like are totally misguided," Kroft said. "What strikes me is the normalcy with which people here live. People continue on with their day to day living and that's what I like to see the best."

Chomiak observed "more tourists on the street" than there were during his first visit, two years ago. "There also seems to be slightly more hope."

Still, he said, "outside of Israel, there is no comprehension whatsoever, about the terrible pressures that the country is under.

"I have a continuing admiration for the incredible determination and energy of the people of Israel," he said. "The perseverance of the people here is always something inspiring."

Participant Nick Logan, who came to Israel for the first time with his wife Christina, also found Israel inspiring.

"I think I'm starting to understand the success of Israel," said Logan, who runs a successful enterprise in Manitoba, called National Leasing. "There is a lot of volunteer work [being done here]. It really gives me more encouragement to go back to Winnipeg and do a lot more."

"The people of Israel that we have met have impressed us with their resourcefulness, their ability to see beyond this day and to continue striving to achieve their goals," Christina added.

For Kroft, seeing Israel through the eyes of first-time Christian visitors like Nick and Christina Logan was the most inspiring aspect of the mission.

"It has made for a more interesting tour because they are seeing things for the first time and we're seeing things through somebody else's eyes," he said. "For me, it is one of the big pluses, to see Israel with people who don't necessarily share my view on every issue."

Chomiak agreed. "My first visit was an incredible opportunity, and coming back now, I have seen more incredible opportunities," he said. "We hope to continue our relationship with Israel, and to establish new relations here because there is so much of value and so much energy and determination here that we can utilize back in Canada in a very positive sense.

"I said two years ago that the trip to Israel was life-changing for me, and it has been life-changing once again."

Jews stay with Democrats in presidential vote

By RON KAMPEAS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — The past four years have seen a defining terrorist attack, a divisive war and a radically different economy, but at the ballot box in the U.S. presidential vote, it seemed, that not much changed.

Election night produced pretty much the same electoral map, pretty much the same angry, polarized nation and pretty much the same anxious obsession with a single state and how it counts its ballots.

And Jews, for their part, voted pretty much the way they did four years ago.

Expectations that Republicans would make inroads into decades of Jewish support for the Democratic Party ran into a wall of Jewish votes for Massachusetts Senator John Kerry, the Democratic candidate.

President George W. Bush's unprecedented closeness to Israel and his reputation for toughness on terrorism did little to shake the traditional 3-1 Jewish break for the Democrats.

Two national exit polls showed Bush gained only slightly more than the 19 per cent of the Jewish vote he scored in 2000: one, from Associated Press, split Kerry-Bush 77 per cent to 23 per cent, while another, from CNN, went 76 per cent to 24 per cent.

A phone survey by pollster Frank Luntz in Florida and Ohio, two battleground states, split the vote 72 per cent to 25 per cent in Kerry's favour, suggesting that the Bush campaign's blitz in those states in the final days might have had a small degree of success.

Luntz's poll also showed a strong Orthodox trend toward Bush, with 69 per cent of Orthodox respondents in Florida and Ohio saying they voted for the president. That conforms with earlier American Jewish Committee polling data.

Despite the unprecedented resources devoted by both campaigns to swaying the Jewish vote, in the end, it was doubtful Jewish voters played a central role in determining the outcome in any of the swing states.

Republican jubilation at Bush's showing – he led the popular vote and apparently won the overall electoral vote, though counting in Ohio could take weeks – was more muted among his Jewish supporters.

"It's not adequate from my point of view," said Ed Koch, a former mayor of New York City, who stumped hard for Bush among Jews from Iowa to Florida.

Koch, a Democrat who said Bush deserved Jewish votes because of his unstinting support for Israel, sounded a familiar Republican Jewish theme: the president deserves Jewish gratitude.

"I'm glad it was an improvement," Koch said, but added, "I think he deserved much more."

That was the theme in many opinion articles that targeted Jews in the campaign's final days.

But others said that expecting any voter to cast a ballot in thanks was unrealistic.

"Jews are multi-issue voters," said Hannah Rosenthal, executive director of the Jewish Council for Public Affairs, the umbrella body for local community relations groups.

Rosenthal said many Jews were also put off by the strength of evangelical Christians in the Bush administration and the Republican-controlled Congress.

"[The close association with evangelical values] is perceived by many in this country as intolerant, and Jews as a people, as a religion and as voters look toward tolerance, big-tent pluralism and outreach."

Concerns about church and state separation figured large in questionnaires returned to American Jewish Committee pollsters in four swing states, where both parties targeted the Jewish community in an ad blitz.

"People voting for Kerry cited domestic policy, church-state separation, abortion, stem-cell research, Supreme Court nominations and President Bush's leadership qualities," said David Harris, the AJCommittee's executive director.

U.S. troubles in Iraq and a sluggish economy also figured in the pro-Kerry vote among Jews.

"Where the Bush campaign failed with the Jewish vote was to swing the undecided, because the Bush campaign had not tacked to the centre," Harris said. Jews supporting Bush cited his support for Israel and his tough stance against terror after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on New York and Washington, Harris said.

Those were the themes Republicans hammered in advertising and campaign blitzes in swing states. And the campaigning might have made a difference. Luntz, the Republican pollster who conducted the phone survey in Ohio and Florida showing a 72-25 split in Kerry's favour, said the improvement from 2000 helped put Bush over the top in both states. "It wasn't the margin of victory, but it contributed to the margin of victory," he said.

Still, in some cases, it may have backfired.

Koch's ubiquitous campaigning for Bush as the best choice for Israel "really annoys the hell out of me," said Maury Shulman, 62, a longtime registered Republican who cast his vote for Kerry at Temple Beth Hillel-Beth El in Wynnewood, Pa., another swing state."I don't think any American president would abandon Israel."

Harris said the small minority of Jews who changed their vote from 2000 went overwhelmingly from Kerry to Bush – and also tended to cite terrorism and Israel as the reasons.

Republicans were especially determined in Ohio, where party activists urged haredi Jews to get out the vote, knowing they trend heavily to the Republicans.

Yehiel Kalish organized babysitting and bussing for haredim in Cleveland and Cincinnati. "The turnout was phenomenal," he said, adding that most haredim likely voted for Bush.

Another community trending strongly to Bush were Russian Jews, Harris said. An AJCommittee election day poll among Russian Jews in Pennsylvania, New York and New Jersey showed a 75-25 split for Bush, with many citing Bush's strong leadership as the reason.

Luntz said his polling also showed higher Republican support among younger Jews.

Literary Pursuits at the Bernard Betel Centre

Writing is a wonderful method of expression for people of all ages, but members of the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living find it a particularly rewarding and healing way of enriching their lives. "I look forward all week to coming here," says Benjamin Levy.

Creativity at work: fun & productive writing classes meet every Friday

Benjamin says he wrote poems when he was younger, but for many years never seemed to find time to write. Now that his wife has moved into a long term care facility, he finds his days lonely. A friend urged him to join the Betel Centre and get active in the many courses the Centre offers.

Becoming a writer has done more than enrich his vocabulary. "It enriches a lot of things. Coming here is a breath of fresh air. You meet people and make new friends; you challenge your mind, you develop new skills and learn from each other."

Benjamin credits his enthusiasm in part to longtime instructor Sylvia Maultash Warsh. "A lot of people dedicate their books to her," he says, for her patient and caring assistance.

Recently, the creative writing group "shepped" special nachas when Warsh was awarded a 2004 Edgar award from Mystery Writers of America for her novel "Find Me Again." Her classes are so popular that the Betel Centre has begun offering a second timeslot to accommodate the growing number of participants.

Many participants first spoke languages other than English. Born in Poland and having lived in Argentina for 25 years, Elsa Thon admits with a smile, "Sometimes, my verbs are not in place." Though she began to write at four years old, she stopped during the war and her working years, only resuming her passion after she retired and came to the Betel Centre.

After years of sharing stories and incorporating suggestions from Warsh and fellow students, Elsa published her own book entitled "I Wish it Were Fiction: Memories 1939-1945." Other students bring memoirs, short and longer fiction, poetry and children's stories they have written. Several years ago, the group published a collection of writings in a wide variety of genres. "It's never too late to learn," says Benjamin.

Creative writing isn't the only literary outlet at the Betel Centre. Every Tuesday, the Book Club discusses a wide range of short stories, and there are also several Literary Luncheons yearly featuring speakers like Anne Balaban and CJN's Bill Gladstone reviewing current books over a delicious kosher lunch.

The Bernard Betel Centre has something for every literary taste. Stop by any Wednesday morning at 11:00 for a tour, or for more information about Creative Writing, Book Club or upcoming Literary Luncheons, please call Barbara at (416) 225-2112, Ext. 134.

Annuities - Tax and Estate Planning Advantages

An annuity is the only investment product that guarantees income for the rest of your life or the life of you and your spouse. It provides peace of mind knowing that you will never out-live your savings.

Annuities Enhance Income

Because the income is made up of part of the principal you invested and the interest that it earns, it is significantly higher than investments that pay interest only, such as a GIC. Let's compare the payout of a $100,000 annuity for a male, age 70, in a 40% marginal tax bracket.

	GIC	Annuity
Investment	$100,000	$100,000
Annual Income	4,500	9,425
Taxable Portion	4,500	2,157
Tax Payable	1,890	863
Net Income	2,610	8,562

The annuity provides an after-tax return of more than twice the income generated by the GIC. In order to generate the same after tax return from a GIC you would have to invest at a rate of 14.27%. The annuity income is guaranteed for life.

The disadvantage is that you forfeit your principal when you die. If this is of concern to you, there are several ways to preserve estate value. Various Guaranteed Periods, Cash or Installment Refund options can be included to assure the payout of the capital invested.

An Insured Annuity preserves 100% of your capital for your estate. Consider the following example, which compares the investment of $200,000 in a GIC at 4.5% with an Insured Annuity, for a man aged 75.

	GIC	Insured Annuity
Capital	200,000	200,000
Annual Income	9,000	21,979
Taxable Income	9,000	3,243
Tax (46%)	4,140	1,492
After Tax Income	4,860	20,487
Insurance Cost	NIL	11,005
Spendable Income	4,860	9,482
Gross Equivalent Yield	4.5%	8.8%
Estate Value	200,000	200,000
Subject to Probate	YES	NO
Guaranteed Period	5 YEARS	LIFE

Effective improved yield on investment = 95%
(This is an illustration only; rates will vary)

The Corporate Insured Annuity Strategy

An Insured Annuity can be acquired by a private corporation. It also becomes a valuable strategy for removing retained earnings from the corporation on a tax-free basis and for reducing or eliminating the capital gains payable on the shares.

Annuity Choices

The flexibility and utility of annuities allows you to choose the type that addresses your specific income and estate planning needs. These needs will typically include one or more of the following.

- Guaranteed retirement income for life;
- Enhanced income for nursing and long-term care without depleting the estate of a loved-one;
- Income for a specific time period;
- Gradual inheritance transfers;
- Charitable gifting;
- Alimony payments;
- Tax and estate planning.

Who Can Benefit?

If you are a retiree who is having trouble making ends meet, you can more than double your after tax income. Since the income is guaranteed for the rest of your life it removes the fear of outliving your income.

If you are a high income retiree who wishes to take advantage of the favourable tax treatment while preserving your estate, you can achieve the best of both worlds with an Insured Annuity.

Don't let SAD bring you down

By SHELLEY MILLMAN HERMAN

Now that we have set our clocks back by one hour, we know that the shorter, darker days of late fall have officially set in.

In early fall, the days are bright and the air is crisp and fresh. Early fall brings a sense of excitement and renewed energy as we take long invigorating walks wearing our warm sweaters, and we feel a sense of joy as we relish the beauty of the colourful autumn leaves. We anticipate the early fall season with images of crackling fires and steaming hot chocolate, and we are filled with a sense of determination to tackle the challenges that the new cycle of school and work brings with it.

But then the leaves start to fall, and we become aware of the days getting shorter, of darkness approaching earlier each day. Many of us begin to notice that our bright mood of early fall is being replaced by a sense of lethargy, and all we want to do is hibernate at home or stay in bed. Antisocial sentiments begin to set in, and rather than greeting the day and our friends with joy, we trudge along in our routines, waiting until we can get back home and hide away.

Does this sound familiar?

If so, then you may be suffering from seasonal affective disorder (SAD), or from a less severe syndrome called winter blues.

SAD was discovered in the early 1980s by the National Institute of Health (NIH). Studies by the institute have shown that more than 36 million people in the United States suffer, to a greater or lesser extent, from SAD or winter blues.

SAD afflicts people primarily during the winter months. Researchers agree that the reduction of sunlight in the fall and winter causes seasonal depression. Without sunlight, the brain doesn't produce enough serotonin and that results in the symptoms of depression. The darker days also signal the brain to overproduce the hibernation hormone, melatonin. SAD causes you to feel down, gloomy and apathetic. You may have difficulty concentrating and feeling alert, or may withdraw socially and have carbohydrate cravings. SAD sufferers may also experience sleep problems.

The symptoms of winter blues are milder than SAD. You may feel a lack of energy and a sense of sadness, but you can still function, while if you have SAD, normal daily routines are difficult to perform.

The NIH has demonstrated that bright light is an effective means of reversing the effects of this winter depression. Studies have shown that if SAD or winter blues sufferers sit by special "mood lamps," (available from a number of websites and retailers) for 20 to 30 minutes per day, the symptoms of depression, lethargy and sleep irregularities are diminished. Light therapy produces serotonin in the brain, and light also suppresses melatonin. Since melatonin is suppressed during the day, our activity cycle is extended and we sleep better at night.

For those of us who have SAD or winter blues, it is important to get a full night's sleep (without oversleeping) during the fall and winter months, so that we replenish our energy.

Although light therapy is available, we shouldn't underestimate the benefits of exposure to natural sunlight. Spending time outdoors during the day is all-important during the long fall and winter months.

So open up your blinds, choose to do some of your exercise outdoors and use some supplemental light therapy if necessary, and your SAD and winter blues will become a thing of the past!

Shul launches cookbook

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Generations to Generations, Beth Torah Synagogue's new cookbook is being launched at a cooking demonstration and boutique night at the synagogue Nov. 16, 7:30 p.m.

The book contains about 350 family recipes that were collected from congregation members.

Ellen Fridman, a member of the cookbook committee, says they started the project by sending out letters and recipe sheets.

"We were shocked with the response. Some people sent in stories with their recipes, and we included those stories that we felt were worth sharing."

Every recipe has a name with it, but there are names behind the recipe as well, such as Bubbie's soup or My Mother's meat loaf.

"While putting the book together we learned that recipes are not only about food, they are also about family memories," she says.

Generations to Generations, published by T.C. Graphics, is bound in coil for easy reading and costs $18 plus GST.

Members of the committee include Barb Weinberg, Donna Goldenberg, Barbara Miller-Schwartz, Lori Goldenberg and Eva Zimmerman.

For information, call Lori Goldenberg at 416-782-4495, ext. 24.

Do you have trouble staying asleep?

New album is songwriter's map home

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to the CJN

Singer-songwriter Mark Weinstock has taken the long way home. And his new album can be described as his road map.

Breeze Home is the 28-year-old's first album since his live album Homemade Series I (2001). He spent the last three years touring North America and writing new material, and says he considered settling in a number of places, including California, New York and Colorado.

"When I first hit the road, all of the themes in my songs were about the wind, listening to the wind, because I really felt a connection to that sense of freedom," Weinstock says.

"And then I noticed that in the song-writing later on in my time on the road, there were all these songs about home. To the point where three songs on the album… all end with the full band harmonizing on the word 'home.' It took the songs to make me realize it's time to go back to the source."

So Weinstock came back to Toronto to record and promote his album. He describes his music as "grassroots" and acknowledges the eclectic mix of sound on his new CD.

The first song, Homemade, was recorded with the All Gods Children Harlem Gospel Choir in New York City (and was a finalist at the UK Songwriting Contest). Other songs were recorded with musicians who used to play with Janis Joplin. He cites folk and Motown artists as his musical influences, and says that his own music has been compared to Van Morrison and Paul Simon. All 11 songs on the album were written, lyrics and music, by Weinstock himself.

But his obvious love is performing.

"My songs touch on a lot of topics people are dealing with and feel connected to," Weinstock says.

"I love sharing something that is deep and meaningful in my life with others. I love the spontaneity [of performing]. It's as if the crowd dictates where the concert will go."

Weinstock has a reputation for being a warm, kind-hearted man who is eager to connect with his audience. He's been known to give a handshake or a hug to each of his audience members before a concert.

"I wish I could play a concert for each and every person," he says.

He describes his concerts as a "festival or carnival atmosphere," where audience members are encouraged to participate in the creative process. Weinstock passes a journal around so that audience members can write down what they're feeling. It's not unusual for there to be paper and crayons so that people can doodle while listening to the music. Weinstock says he's keen to give people a "multi-sensory experience."

"A successful concert is where people feel different leaving from when they came in."

Weinstock says his music is often influenced by his Jewish background. A graduate of both USDS and CHAT, he says he is intrigued by niggunim, which are wordless melodies often passed down through generations.

He comes from a long line of singers: his mother was a singer, and his grandfather was the understudy of the local cantor in a Polish village. Today, Jewish folktale is alive in Weinstock's music; the song Fair Maiden is about the Jewish concept that people are paired with their bashert (beloved) in heaven before they are born.

"That song just flowed," Weinstock says. "It just happened and I wrote it down…. The easiest way is when inspiration finds you. When a song taps me on the shoulder."

Now that he's home, Weinstock says he will continue to write more music, as well as offer music workshops for children through the schools. One of his songs was recently featured in the film Siblings in the Toronto International Film Festival. Weinstock has also been recording music for other independent movies and television programs, as well as working on novel. He says he wants to offer his CD for community fundraisers and maybe even expand his record label, Kind Records, to take on other acts.

This diversity exemplifies how Weinstock approaches his art.

"I really believe," he says, "the more open we allow ourselves to be, the more experiences will come our way."

Weinstock will be performing with Miranda Stone at the Free Times Cafe, 320 College St., Toronto on Nov. 18 at 8 p.m. On Dec. 5 between 2 and 4 p.m., he'll be at the Ugly Mug Cafe in London, Ont. with Adlai Waxman.

Anyone interested in purchasing the album, or using the album as a fundraiser, can find Weinstock's details on his website www.markweinstock.com.

Violinist plays jazz and produces a fiddle extravganza

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Violinist Lenny Solomon, a former member of the Juno Award-winning 1970s pop duo Myles and Lenny, has been making music for decades, crossing musical genres with ease.

He's performed with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and Trio Norte, and appeared on stage with Liza Minelli, Tony Bennett and Anne Murray.

His venture into jazz netted him two well-received CDs in the 1990s and Jazz Report's violinist of the year award three times.

Today, Solomon, 52, divides his time between his new jazz quintet, whose CD, Transparency, was recently released, and Bowfire, a Broadway-style violin extravaganza.

Transparency includes the anthem of jazz violinists – Sweet Georgia Brown by Oliver Nelson, a popular writer from the 1950s and '60s – and two compositions by Joe Venuti, Wild Dog and Black Satin.

"I had written a bit of material and had also been performing the music of the great jazz violinists that I love like Joe Venuti, Stephane Grappelli, Stuff Smith and Eddie South – the historical names of jazz violin," Solomon said.

"I wanted to make a combination of new material written by a current jazz violinist, i.e., myself, and some people that I collaborated with, and draw from some of the older material that was played or written by those great names."

Solomon, along with Transparency's producer Shelly Berger, wrote the blues tune Don't Tell Me What To Do for the CD. Berger also wrote a great arrangement of Oh Susannah, which leads off the recording. Solomon and his guitarist Geoff Young adapted Etude No. 24 by Paganini, titling it Paganini Blues, adding a little swing guitar, à la Django Reinhardt and the Hot Club of France.

"There is so much music out there and I just want to play it all," Solomon said.

But jazz is just one of two major projects Solomon's been working on. His other passion is Bowfire, a show that he has produced.

Bowfire features some of the best violinists and fiddlers playing a variety of styles, including classical, jazz, country, rock, Texas swing and bluegrass.

"We also have a great erhu player, which is a Chinese violin," Solomon said. "There is a world-music aspect to the show. It is backed up by a five-piece rhythm section. We've added Broadway-style production values, elaborate sets, costumes and choreography. A few of the fiddle players are incredible step dancers and can dance and fiddle at the same time."

Bowfire tours the United States, for the third time, this month and tours Asia for a month next spring. Although the show has done well internationally, it has yet to get exposure in Canada.

"We get some very exciting offers, but none of them are in Canada," Solomon says. "It is really a shame. I hope that changes."

One of the benefits of Bowfire is that he gets to tour with his wife, Wendy, a cellist with the show, he says.

"From personal experience, I can tell you travelling with a wife or partner is way better than being alone on the road. She has a great ear for [the] music we do together – an invaluable musical partner," he says of his wife of seven years.

She plays cello on Transparency, which also features pianist Phil Dwyer, bassist Pat Collins, drummer Barry Romberg and guitarist Young.

The CD is exclusively available on Solomon's newly launched website, www.lennysolomon.com.

CONVERSATION WITH DAVID BEZMOZGIS, GOVERNOR GENERAL'S AWARD NOMINEE

David Bezmozgis

David Bezmozgis, whose book Natasha and Other Stories is in the running for a Governor General's literary award this month, writes by computer and deliberates carefully over each sentence before moving on to the next, he told an audience at the International Festival of Authors at Harbourfront last week.

"The craft is very conscious," he said during an onstage interview. "It takes a long time for me to write. My first draft is normally my final draft because I'm constantly editing. I can spend a day on a single paragraph and frequently do."

He acknowledged that his stories, which focus on a young Russian-Jewish émigré and his family in the Finch-Bathurst corridor of Toronto, are largely autobiographical, and added that his only goal as a writer was to "do the community justice" in a fictional depiction.

Since his parents were familiar with Russian literature but not with magazines like the New Yorker and Harper's, where several of his stories were originally published, he said they initially were "kind of nervous" about the publication of his stories because they thought people wouldn't know the line between fiction and fact.

"But now they've stopped caring, or they don't care as much – that's been their reaction. They understand that it's not as threatening as they perceived at first."

Now people approach his parents at weddings and bar mitzvahs to praise the book. "The response from within the community has been very favourable… and it's made them very proud of me," the author-screenwriter said.

Asked about the Holocaust, Bezmozgis said it was central to his self-perception, and he discussed the devastation that occurred in Russia during World War II, which is known as the Great Patriotic War in Russia.

"If you can say it's bad enough for the Russians, it's doubly bad for the Jews," he said. "The Jews were targeted in a way much worse than the Russians… In light of all the things that came after, how do we define ourselves in relation to it? It's not a question I can answer, but it is one that comes up in the book."

His own self-identity "depends on where I am," he said. "When I'm in America, I feel Canadian. When I'm in my community, I feel less Russian… It's the opposite of wherever I am. But I don't feel uncomfortable in any of these incarnations.

"Anyone who says it does matter and you have to define yourself in any one way, then I think they're suffering from some kind of pathology."

Bezmozgis has already made a documentary about Bay Street lawyers and has another script in development, but he is presently focused on writing a novel, he said. The winner of the Governor General's literary prize is to be announced Nov. 16.

AND ONE MORE PRIZE FOR DAVID BEZMOZGIS

David Bezmozgis, 31, has won the 2004 Reform Judaism Prize for Jewish Fiction for Natasha And Other Stories (Farrar, Straus & Giroux), his debut collection of short stories.

Bezmozgis will receive a $5,000 award during a special presentation at the New York headquarters of the Union for Reform Judaism and will also be featured in the Spring 2005 edition of Reform Judaism, which has the largest circulation of any Jewish publication in the world.

The judges also named two finalists for the 2004 prize: Michael Andre Bernstein, for his novel Conspirators (Farrar, Straus & Giroux); and Naama Goldstein, for The Place Will Comfort You (Scribner).

The Reform Judaism Prize for Jewish Fiction was created in 2003 by Dr. Alexander Mauskop, a Larchmont, NY neurologist, to encourage promising Jewish fiction writers.

"Natasha is a moving, delicate, sometimes shocking, and always carefully crafted work of art about the collision of worlds - Jewish, Soviet, North American, and more importantly, the worlds of childhood and adulthood," said Dara Horn, one of the judges. "Bezmozgis brings his readers into the space between these worlds and refuses to let them go."

Jewish Film Society presents 'avant garde' movies

By PHYLLIS FELDMAN
Special to The CJN

If you're thinking about what to do on Sundays, take a look at the Toronto Jewish Film Society.

Now in its 27th year, the Toronto Jewish Film Society (TJFS) presents eight films, beginning in January, with a break during the summer months.

The lineup of screenings dramatize or document Jewish experiences around the world, including works about the Holocaust, Yiddish comedies, Israeli documentaries, contemporary European art films, current movies with Jewish themes and old Hollywood melodramas.

Members of the executive committee from various artistic backgrounds research and select the films for the upcoming season. Each film is introduced by a keynote speaker and frequently followed by a question and answer period.

The society has partnered with the Goethe-Institut, Hillel of Greater Toronto and Friends of Yiddish for some of its programs, and would welcome expanded partnership opportunities in the future.

"We are innovative and avant garde in our programming and getting more so each year," says TJFS chair Barbara Coven. "In 2004, we screened the French documentary-style film Decryptage, (Decoding), illustrating how sections of the French media persistently blame Israel for Palestinian violence. Two years ago, we premiered the North American showing of Gloomy Sunday, a romantic melodrama set in pre-World War II Budapest.

Originally housed at the Leah Posluns Theatre, showing films to a small core group of members, TJFS membership has grown each year, primarily by word of mouth, to include 460 avid movie-goers. It joined the roster of Miles Nadal JCC programming in November 1993. For the next 10 years, the TJFS screened films at the Art Gallery of Ontario's Hal Jackman Hall. In November 2003, it moved to its current venue – the newly built 500-seat Al Green Theatre at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, fully equipped with state-of-the-art film projection and sound system.

"The committee has recently finalized next year's program, and we're looking forward to an exciting season for 2005," Coven says."Our membership is growing each year, because we show such a broad range of films in all genres of the Jewish life spectrum, which appeals to an extensive group of viewers."

In the 2005 season, TJFS members can look forward to some provocative, challenging and entertaining films from the United States, Israel, Cuba, Iraq, Ireland and Argentina.

Shalom Ireland, for example, one of the selections highlighting Jews from unlikely places, is a portrait of the little known Irish-Jewish community. Because of minimal anti-Semitism and a connection between the oppressed Irish Catholic community and the Jews fleeing Europe, the once thriving group of 5,000, now at 1,200, was allowed to flourish in Dublin, Cork and Limerick.

Cuba Mia follows a group of Cuban Jews now living in Miami, as they revisit their childhood homes and relive some poignant memories.

Also on the roster is Ivan and Abraham, the story of a nine-year-old Jewish boy and his Catholic friend who live in a small border town during the 1930s, in the climate of brewing anti-Semitism in Poland. They flee to the countryside to escape the impending violence.

Other films to be shown include the controversial American film Goodbye Columbus, starring Richard Benjamin in his film debut; and The Soul Keeper, a compelling dramatization of the life of Sabina Spielrein, the first of Carl Jung's patients to be cured by psychoanalysis, who later became his lover.

"We want to encourage the next generation of movie buffs over 18 to come out, bring their friends and see what we have to offer," says Coven. "There is definitely something here for everyone."

The cost of becoming a TJFS member is $75 for eight movies. Single screenings are $12 at the door, $10 for JCC members. There are two showings, at 4 and 7 p.m.

For TJFS membership or to receive the new 2005 brochure, please call Joelle Malka at 416-924-6211, ext. 139 or e-mail her at joellemalka@milesnadaljcc.ca.

Soviet doctors' plot subject of book based on top-secret archives

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

On Jan. 13, 1953, almost two months before Joseph Stalin's death, the Soviet Union disclosed that a widespread conspiracy, hatched by disloyal physicians, had been uncovered against its dear leader.

The arrest of these doctors, many of them Jews, was accompanied by fantastic rumours that Jewish physicians were poisoning Russian children and killing newborn infants in maternity hospitals.

The shocking disclosure was grist for the state-controlled press.

In a typical article, Tass declared, "It has been established that these killer doctors, these monsters who trod underfoot the holy banner of science and defiled the honour of men of science, were in the pay of foreign intelligence services."

Coming on the heels of the 1947-48 anti-cosmopolitan campaign and the subsequent destruction of the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee, the so-called doctors' plot was the final anti-Semitic gasp of a totalitarian regime.

Now the subject of Stalin's Last Crime (HarperCollins) by Jonathan Brent and Vladimir Naumov, the book is based on top-secret documents unearthed from Soviet archives in the 1990s.

According to the authors, the infamous doctors' plot was "the natural outgrowth of the bureaucratic, political, psychological and moral structure of Stalin's system of government."

As they see it, the plot began haphazardly, without plan or clear intention on Stalin's part, and gradually morphed into a fabricated cause celebre.

It had its origins in two apparently unrelated events – the anti-cosmopolitan campaign, which culminated with the execution of the members of the Jewish Anti-Fascist Commitee, and the death of Andrei Zhdanov, a powerful Politburo member.

The anti-cosmopolitan campaign, which was directed almost exclusively at Jews, was unleashed with a fusillade of incendiary editorials in government periodicals attacking alleged Jewish ideological sabotage of the arts.

All but coinciding with the birth of Israel and the Zionist fervour that swept through the Soviet Jewish population, the sub-text of the plot was that Jews could not be trusted and were basically potential fifth columnists.

From 1948 to 1953, thousands of Jewish intellectuals, scientists, politicians, state security personnel and private individuals were interrogated, dismissed from their positions, publicly ridiculed, threatened and imprisoned.

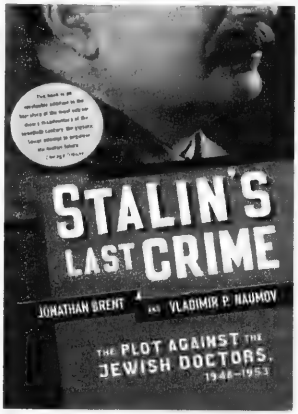
One of the victims, the internationally known actor and founder of the Moscow Yiddish Theatre, Solomon Mikhoels, was murdered in Minsk on orders from Stalin.

In the aftermath of his death, all Jewish theatres were closed, Jews were fired en masse from the professions and health care facilities and 13 members of the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee – the most important post-war Soviet Jewish organization – were executed after having been convicted of anti-Soviet activity.

A local observer, Yakov Rapoport, commented: "Jewish culture in the Soviet Union was put before the firing squad, its finest representatives physically destroyed."

As relations between the Soviet Union and Israel deteriorated in the early 1950s, the tenor of official anti-Semitism sharpened.

Like all of Stalin's machinations, the doctors' plot, which enveloped the security services as well as Kremlin leaders and led to 1930s-style purges, had a generic character. During the 1920s and 1930s, kulaks (farmers) and Trotskyists, respectively, had been targeted. And in the early 1950s, Stalin took aim at Jewish nationalism.



As Brent and Naumov write, "In Stalin's new plot the Jews were inextricably bound up with America. Whoever was Jewish was for America, and whoever was for America was Jewish or had become influenced by Jews."

They quote one high-ranking Soviet official as saying, "In Moscow there live more than a million and a half Jews. They have seized the medical posts, the legal profession, the union of composers and the union of writers. I'm not even speaking of the trade networks. Meanwhile of these Jews only a handful are useful to the state, all the rest are potential enemies of the state."

As Israel became more identified with the United States and the Western camp, Stalin's wrath grew. At a meeting of the Central Committee in December 1952, he accused "every Jew" of being "a potential spy for the United States."

Stalin was, at best, ambivalent about Jews. They had been useful to him during World War II, when the Soviet Union was besieged by Nazi Germany. And he had allowed his daughter to marry a Jew, Grigory Morozov. But by 1951, he had become suspicious of Jews.

Stalin's paranoia seeped into neighbouring Soviet allies such as Czechoslovakia, where Rudolph Slansky, the Jewish general secretary of the Communist party, was arrested and charged with being a Zionist spy.

Of course, these purges were charged with irony. In the United States, the Jews Julius and Ethel Rosenberg were electrocuted after being convicted of spying for the Soviet Union.

If Stalin had lived longer, he would have exiled the majority of Soviet Jews to camps in Siberia, the construction of which had begun just before he died.

Stalin enlisted the help of a professor of philosophy, Dmitri Chesnokov, who had a Jewish wife, to provide a Marxist-Leninist justification for the planned deportations.

Under Stalin's plan, Jews would "voluntarily" be deported because they recognized the "righteous indignation" of the Russian people and feared reprisals.

The Jewish journalist, Ilya Ehrenburg, who received the Stalin Prize in 1953 in a cynical gesture, claimed that he had been approached to sign a letter requesting that Jews be saved from "the wrath of the people" by being shipped off to Birobidjan.

Ehrenburg refused, but he dashed off a letter to Stalin warning him that his plans would have dire international repercussions. Such was the surreal atmosphere in Moscow that Stalin's Jewish toady, Lazar Kaganovich, accused Ehrenburg of spreading false stories about the prevalence of anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union.

With Stalin's death on March 5, the doctors' plot ended abruptly. A month later, Pravda laid the matter to rest. "The result of a review of the doctors' plot showed that (they) had been arrested... incorrectly, without any legal basis... Accusations brought forward against the accused were false and the documentary basis on which the security agents relied was insufficient."

Tellingly enough, Pravda also exonerated Mikhoels and the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee.

Pravda concluded its commentary with a rhetorical flourish. "Each citizen of the great Soviet state may be assured that his rights are guaranteed by the constitution of the Soviet Union, that they will be sacredly guarded and preserved by the Soviet government."

The doctors whose reputations had been sullied were immediately rehabilitated, but the damage had been done. Once again, the Soviet Union was revealed as a dictatorial state where the rule of law was observed nearly always in the breach.

NOW, MORE THAN EVER!

No Barak speech until security assured, Concordia says to speak on the Concordia campus during the current academic year, the precise date to be determined once security concerns have been addressed."

The federation said Concordia's decision had been conveyed to Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker "following extensive discussions" with the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and the federation over the previous three weeks.

CIJA chief executive officer Hershell Ezrin told The CJN that an Oct. 27 letter by Lowy to Baker amounts to a confirmation that Concordia will invite Barak on campus this academic year "at a mutually convenient time." But Lowy does write that Concordia will do so "once security concerns are taken care of."

The federation release apparently took Concordia by surprise, and the immediate response from Concordia's senior public relations officer Chris Mota was that the university's position was the same as had been outlined in an op.-ed. article by Lowy that was published in the Gazette, the Toronto Star and Le Devoir Oct. 25 and 26.

In fact, Mota pointed out to The CJN that in a covering letter to the op.-ed. article sent to these and other daily newspapers, it is pointed out that "over the next few months, we will evaluate the financial implications of upgrading the security of a venue [on campus] to create a facility capable of hosting high-profile speakers.

"It is our intention to have this venue upgraded during this academic year and to be able to host Mr. Barak, among others, on our campus by June 2005."

In his latest statement, Lowy reiterated that the university is in the midst of a security assessment by "experts" of several locations on campus to determine if physical modifications are possible to at least one of them so that an event, like a public lecture by Barak, "can be held with the proper level of security, dignity and respect, which such a visit demands."

He said it will "certainly" not be possible to host such an event this calendar year.

Mota said the security report is expected to be submitted "within a matter of weeks." The Loyola campus' 570-seat Oscar Peterson Hall has been prominent among the locations being studied, she said. Concordia has, in the past, suggested that a demonstration at the Loyola campus would be easier for security forces to control because of its open spaces, in comparison to the downtown Hall building, which is right on the street.

Concordia has already directly invited Barak to speak under its auspices at an off-campus site, likely Place des Arts' 3,000-seat Salle Wilfrid-Pelletier, but he declined. Concordia made the offer after the Jewish community leadership and Hillel, which had planned to bring Barak to Concordia in October, declined the university's offer to co-sponsor Barak's lecture off-campus.

Ezrin told The CJN that CIJA and the federation had a series of meetings with Lowy and other senior administrators since their decision in late September to not allow Barak on campus. The community officials "appreciate" the university's security concerns, he said, but insist that "outside agitators must not dictate who can speak on campus."

Lowy accepted an invitation to speak at a CIJA board meeting Oct. 18 in Toronto. CIJA restated its demand to Lowy that Concordia must "as a first step" invite Barak on campus, Ezrin said. He said CIJA co-ordinated its efforts with Israeli authorities, including Baker, and Barak's office.

Meanwhile, a B'nai Brith Canada official suggested that the timing of the federation release was intended to detract from a cryptic media advisory B'nai Brith issued two hours earlier last Thursday headlined, "Major new development in Concordia University controversy."

B'nai Brith held a press conference Friday to announce that it had filed a complaint of discrimination against Concordia with the Quebec Human Rights Commission. It alleges the Jewish community is being denied its freedom of speech and that Jewish students have been subject to several years of "anti-Zionist bullying" from other students and sometimes "fanatical" professors, which the university has failed to curb.

The action was not supported by CIJA or the federation, which believe its closed-door talks with university officials have made progress.

David Matas, the organization's national legal counsel, said the Jewish community "does not speak with one voice" on this issue. "If our opinion is different from others, so be it."

Moreover, B'nai Brith is demanding that Barak be allowed to speak at the downtown campus, "not in the suburbs," said Matas, who lives in Winnipeg.

Steven Slimovitch, also a national legal counsel, said Concordia must invite Barak back and put in place any necessary security measures, rather than wait for the results of another security evaluation.

"As things stand now, from what the university is saying, security concerns could still trump freedom of speech. We are saying that it is never acceptable for security concerns to limit rights guaranteed by the charter," Matas said.

Slimovitch said B'nai Brith is seeking this legal remedy now because its "repeated" meetings and representations to Concordia over at least the past three years have not changed the situation.

Family laundry business celebrates 75th anniversary

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Three-quarters of a century after his grandfather and great-uncle founded Careful Hand Laundry & Dry Cleaners, company president Brian Chelsky celebrated the company's 75th anniversary recently with a party for about 75 employees, suppliers, relatives and friends in its main location at 2700 Dufferin St. near Briar Hill.

Careful's elegant logo has graced the Avenue and Davenport roads area for decades and presently hangs outside outlets at 195 Davenport Ave. and 808 York Mills Rd. at Leslie Street. An independent franchisee at 1844 Avenue Rd. also does business under the company name.

The front of Careful's Dufferin Street headquarters has been turned into a shrine of corporate history. An attractive montage of copies of early leases, deeds, insurance policies, articles and photographs has been papered onto the walls. Artifacts on display include shirtbands and hangers from the 1950s and '60s, and a coal-heated iron of the sort that was commonly used around the time the business was started just before the Great Depression.

"I'd prefer to show everybody these items rather than keep them in a box somewhere," Chelsky said.

This photo of Careful Hand Laundry's former location on Avenue Road near Davenport Road dates from the '40s. The company recently celebrated its 75th anniversary.

Careful Hand Laundry has clearly impressed multitudes of satisfied customers since it was founded by Chelsky's grandfather and great-uncle, Alex and Jack Shindman, in Toronto in 1929.

Alex Shindman arrived in Toronto from the Kiev area about 1927. The following year, he and older brother Jack visited relatives in Chicago who persuaded them to enter the hand laundry business. After starting a successful company in Chicago and selling it at a profit, the brothers returned to Toronto and opened the first Careful Hand Laundry on Queen Street.

Recognizing the need to be closer to their posh clientele, they moved to Rosedale and later to a location at 152 Avenue Rd., where they served the city's carriage trade for more than 50 years. Alex's soon-to-be son-in-law, Sidney Chelsky, joined the business in 1958 and, with wife Brenda, eventually acquired full ownership of it.

Brian Chelsky began working in the family firm as a boy. At 21, he spent six months on a kibbutz in Israel and was logically assigned laundry duty. "I was the only one who didn't mind working in the laundry," recalled the 42-year-old company president.

Careful has earned a spotless reputation through its impeccable and individual treatment of garments and its state-of-the-art machines, Chelsky said. "All our garments are hand-finished, we have hand irons at each station. We do about 2,000 shirts a week. We also do jackets, pants, suits, formal wear, sweaters, towels, table linens – we get everything."

Shirts and other dry-cleaned items are often stuffed with tissue to help them maintain their form, he said; plastic bags used by the company are thicker and hangers more sturdy than those of the competition, he added. "We don't pin garments to hangers because it creates a hole. And we don't use staples for dry-cleaning tags, we use plastic bullets."

He proudly shows off an award the company has won from the Ontario Ministry of the Environment for being environmentally responsible.

At the party, Chelsky awarded gifts to employees, suppliers and other industry people in recognition of their loyalty. Each recipient was given a miniature replica of a Careful Hand Laundry delivery truck from the '30s. "Everybody who got one of those little trucks was tickled pink," he said.

Israeli ice dancers win bronze at Skate Canada

By JOEL JACOBSON
Special to The CJN

HALIFAX — The International Skating Union's new scoring system suits the Israeli ice dance team of Galit Chait and Sergei Sakhnovski just fine, thank you.

After a second place finish at Skate America in Pittsburgh on Oct. 24, the couple earned bronze in Halifax at Skate Canada one week later, but they were extremely excited about their finish.

Chait, who leapt into the air when she saw their final marks in Halifax, was thrilled that she and Sakhnovski received higher technical marks than they did in their silver medal performance in Pittsburgh.

With the ISU's new, more objective scoring system, "we know what we have to do. If we do the right moves, we get the points. If we don't, or make a mistake, we won't," she said. "Skating under this new system means you don't just move ahead when someone retires. It's noticeable for the skaters that… you can move up on ability."

The ISU changed its scoring system after years of controversy, culminating in a judging scandal at the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City when Canadian pairs skaters Jamie Sale and David Pelletier lost the gold to a pair of Russian skaters. (They were later awarded a shared gold.)

Chait and Sakhnovski, who train in Simsbury, Conn., under coach Tatiana Tarasova, skated a strong free performance in Halifax. It moved them from fourth to third overall and earned them a total of 200.97 points, under their best-ever score of 204.32 in Pittsburgh but good enough to overtake a French team.

The Israeli pair, who are both 29, have been skating together since 1994.

Chair, who was born in Israel but raised and educated in the United States, has been skating since age nine after becoming enamoured with the sport when her parents took her to skate at Rockefeller Centre in New York City.

A singles skater at first, Chait met noted coach Natalia Dubova on a trip to Russia when her father opened a skating camp there. Dubova suggested that she try dance, so she teamed with Russian native Maxim Sevostianov and skated at the U.S. Nationals in 1994.

"We skated for the U.S. and finished sixth in the country in our first year. But [Sevostianov] didn't have the desire to keep on, and I wanted to skate through two more Olympic cycles [1998 and 2002]. I had to make a decision," said the petite blonde.

Chait returned to Israel, to the rink funded by Canada at Metulla, and found Sakhnovski.

"We got ready for our first world championships in three months," she said. "But, after skating through all the practices in Birmingham, England, we were told we couldn't compete because Sergei had competed for Russia at the Europeans that year, and the rules state you can't skate for two countries in the same year."

They shook off the disappointment and began to train long and hard. By 1998, they finished 14th at both the Olympics and Worlds, and 12th at the Europeans. They kept advancing, finishing 5th at the Worlds in 2000, then becoming the first skaters from Israel to medal at the Worlds when they won a bronze in 2002. They were sixth at the Olympics in 2002.

The Moscow-born Sakhnovski emigrated to Israel about a month before he met Chait. "I was skating ice dance in Russia [the country he represented when he won the junior world championship in 1993], but my partner [Ekaterina Svirina] stayed there and I wanted to get out. When I left, it was a bad time for [Jews], but I think my parents and grandparents felt more persecution."

Sakhnovski said he arrived in Israel with no intention of skating again, but he was asked to "try it with Galit. I did, and we're still skating 10 years later."

They plan to skate together at least until the 2006 Olympics, and they hope to win golds at Grand Prix events and Worlds until then. They usually skate in six or seven competitions a year,

Israeli ice dancers Galit Chait and Sergei Sakhnovski

Boris Chait, Galit's father and president of the Israel Ice Skating Federation, was direct when asked why the pair train in Connecticut.

"If you want to advance, you need coaches. You see Canadians skating in France. Skaters go where there are other skaters and good coaches. We don't have enough good coaches or enough high quality skaters [in Israel]. There are only about 25 senior and junior skaters in Israel."

He said the rink at Metulla is heavily used by skaters of all abilities. "Part of our problem is that we are told the rink has to make money. There is no money for skating from the state, so we don't have enough to develop the sport. If not for me, and the skating federation, we'd be the lowest-ranked country in the world. As it is, we're considered a power."

Despite the challenges and although it takes time to develop skaters, he said, "we have a fellow who's in the top 24 in Europe, a pairs team training to qualify for the Olympics and another dance team, that is 15th in the world. Plus, we have juniors being recognized by the skating community."

Sakhnovski and Galit said they feel little pressure skating for Israel.

"We're never booed or get a negative reaction [because of political turmoil in the Middle East]," said Galit. "We represent our country. It's an honour."

Ontario launches kids' sports participation campaign

The government of Ontario has launched a campaign to promote children's participation in sports and other recreational activities that require them to be physically active.

"This government recognizes the importance of encouraging Ontarians to become healthier, happier and more productive through regular physical activity and sport participation," said Minister of Tourism and Recreation Jim Bradley. "Under the [province's] ACTIVE2010 strategy and the "pause to PLAY" campaign, the goal is to increase participation in sport and physical activity rate so that by the year 2010, 55 per cent of Ontarians are physically active."

"Pause to PLAY" is designed to appeal to 10- to 14-year-olds by using a mix of advertising to showcase popular sports (hockey, volleyball, snowboarding, biking) and encourage youth to "pause" their video games and computers, and also to turn off the TV and go outside to play.

Approximately 30 per cent of Canadian children are considered overweight or obese, and only 54 per cent of school-age children between 5 and 14 participate in sport.

The campaign includes a website, www.pausetoplay.ca, as well as transit ads, Internet banner ads, in-store posters, magazine ads and movie house ads. The campaign will run until March 31.

"By encouraging increased physical activity and sport participation among our children and youth, we are establishing a strong foundation for sustaining physical activity into a healthier adulthood," said Bradley.

Pressure? What pressure?

20something

BY SANDIE BENITAH

It's happened.

The engagement trend is in full swing among my group of friends. It started with one surprise announcement about two years ago, and since then, so many people I have grown up with are taking the plunge that I've completely lost count of how many weddings are just around the corner.

It's not as if we're getting old. We're only 24, and most of us are still living in the comfortable nests of our parents' homes, but it still seems that suddenly there's a mad dash to get to the chupah and that I just might be the last person to be left standing under it.

The pressure is definitely on, but it's interesting to think about where it's coming from.

At first, I thought that maybe it's been coming from my friends, who during our girls' nights out have been comparing notes on wedding planners instead of who the cutest waiter is.

They remind me of how great it is to be in love and how exciting it is to look forward to something new in life. But I can't stop thinking about how much fun we have and how free we are when we go out as cute 20something girls – and how lucky we are to be living in the 21st century, when the traditional pressures to get married and be barefoot and pregnant by age 18 are things of the distant past.

I certainly didn't think the pressure would ever come from my parents, who up until I was 14 never referred to me by my real name, but as "my baby" and "little one."

Alas, even the baby of the family needs to get married, they recently informed me, and hopefully sooner rather than later.

I was shocked. This was coming from the two people who freaked out when I suggested that moving out on my own might be good for me.

Still, they brought up a good point. It's not about getting married this second, it's about planning for my future – and, even more importantly, their future as grandparents.

Yet, in so many ways, I just don't have time to be married. There are way too many things that I want to do before I can ever make such a commitment. Call me selfish and I will agree, because I know that this will probably be the only time in my life when I have control over my future and I'm young enough and free enough to explore all of my options.

Sure, I'm becoming responsible and settling down, but I'm just not ready to give up buying that new shirt because I'm saving for the married life.

Not yet, but soon my time will come.

No matter where it's coming from, I'm happy about the pressure, because it has really forced me to think seriously about the sanctity of marriage.

It's a wonder that marriage is still so popular, considering how popular divorce has become these days. If there's anything I've learned from watching all of the couples around me, it's that it takes a lot more than just love to make a marriage work. It takes teamwork, patience and a maturity that is way beyond me right now.

There are some people who can make it work, but for now, I'm still trying to make life work for myself.

The time will come for me and my Prince Charming, and when it does, I won't settle for anything less than forever.

For now, I think I'll just live in the moment.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My friend and I have been close for many years. We met in junior high school and ended up raising families at the same time. Although some years we've been in touch more than others, we have always stayed in contact. This vibrant, exciting woman has changed completely in the last few months. She no longer takes care of her appearance, she sleeps a lot and her previously immaculate house is a mess. I don't have a clue what she does with her days, but I know she doesn't belong to any groups or clubs.

Her youngest child left to go to university this year and maybe she's lonely. I was under the impression that her marriage is fine, but who knows what goes on behind closed doors. I don't know if I should confront her about what I'm seeing or just leave it alone. Maybe I'll embarrass her, and I don't want to do that. What do you think?

Meddling or Helping

Dear Meddling or Helping

It sounds to me like your friend may have a bad case of empty nest syndrome. Her last child leaving home may have unleashed some unfamiliar feelings. Her duties as a day-to-day mother have diminished considerably, and she may need to rediscover her worth as a person and not just as a mother. Other things may also be going on. As you said, you don't know how her marriage is, or she may be trying to deal with menopause.

Regardless of all these things, it's not your job to make a diagnosis, but it is your job as a dear friend to help guide her. At this point she may need counselling and/or medication to get over the hump. She also needs to fill her life with new projects, things that will not only keep her busy, but will make her feel good as well. She may want to join a fitness club, do volunteer work, take a course or start a hobby.

She needs direction and you can be there to help as she enters Part 2 of her life. Maybe you could have a spa day together, or go shopping with her. She's given a lot of her life to others. Help her see that it's OK to start living for herself, too.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN., email: eb@cjnews.com. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

Enter Avrum, lover and matchmaker

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

"And Yitzchak went out to meditate in the field… he lifted up his eyes and lo! There were camels coming. And Rivkah, too, lifted up her eyes and she saw Yitzchak. She let herself slip down from the camel… She took her veil and covered herself. And Yitzchak brought her into the tent… he married Rivkah, she became his wife and he loved her." (Bereshit).

Exquisite! How generous it is to be privy every single year to the first moments when Yitzchak, our patriarch, and Rivkah, our matriarch, gazed upon each other. What a stunningly romantic and titillating landscape of love, one in which we are biblical voyeurs of a blind date that works, and of the actualization of some of the most powerful drives and needs within us – love, romance and companionship.

I write this column as a man who has fallen in love. My heart is aflame like a bonfire at the pinnacle of its warmth and prowess, and I want so badly for others to experience the same romantic warmth that wraps itself around me like a tallit.

To this end, I am playing the matchmaker in this column, my goal being to share information about a friend, a most distinctive and exceptional woman, who is also seeking true love and romance. I hope a reader will come in from his field, "lift up his eyes" and like Yitzchak, find his Rivkah.

The woman I speak of is vivacious and exciting, with an eagerness to soar. She is is a traditional Jew who is enamoured by the iridescent flames of the Shabbat and Chanukah candles and the questioning nature of Judaism. My friend has a vibrant personality, buttressed and bolstered by the richness that comes with turning 50.

She is calming yet persuasive; peaceful but rambunctious; and childlike in spirit yet seductively feminine in her gait and cleverness.

Like the biblical matriarch Leah, the wife of Jacob, my friend's eyes are tender and reflect a humanitarian kindness – a look I have also detected in the eye of her two grown teenagers. As the Torah says about the matriarch Sarah, the wife of Abraham, she too is "beautiful to look upon" and expresses an internal splendour – each of which enhances the other.

This is my friend. She is a writer of films, plays and short stories. She studied German and Yiddish. She is a conversationalist extraordinaire and stands in awe and wonder about mystical ironies such as the coloured metamorphosis of a leaf prior to its fall and demise.

We are currently reading the book of Bereshit, which is filled with glistening perplexity, lustrous creativity, and romance and love. Love is in the air, and it is upon the lips of those who study this book and its complexly simple characters.

I am the matchmaker and happily present my friend to you. I hope that this article will culminate in you, the reader, mimicking Yitzchak by bringing my friend into your tent, so that the two of you may find, nurture and embrace romantic love, forever.

My friend is seeking a man who is on a personal journey. He should have a well-developed sense of soul, and he should inspire and seek inspiration, and hunger for love.

If this is you – if you see her image through my words, sense the profundity of her character and think you might be her Yitzchak – write me at avrum@veahavta.org. I will do my utmost to broker your mutual love, no shidduch fee required.

"I believe that the important thing in life is to love and be loved."

Arafat's death evokes mostly terse community responses

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The death last week of Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat drew terse and guarded reactions from government spokespeople and Jewish community leaders, with most comments focusing on the future of the Palestinian people and the peace process.

In Ottawa, Prime Minister Paul Martin offered his "condolences and sympathy to the family of Chairman Arafat, as well as all Palestinians."

Arafat, he said, "personified the Palestinian people's struggle to see their right to self-determination realized. [His] influence on regional and global events has been undeniable."

Martin noted that while a comprehensive peace between Israelis and Palestinians was never attained in Arafat's lifetime, the Palestinian leader was awarded the 1994 Nobel Peace Prize, along with former Israeli prime ministers Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres.

Canada called on Palestinians and all peoples of the Middle East "to reflect on the tremendous cost of conflict, and, building on the legacy of their leaders and the guidance of their governments, to renew their commitment to peace."

GA opens in Cleveland

CLEVELAND — The modern State of Israel is the "ultimate imagine," Silvan Shalom, Israel's foreign minister and deputy prime minister, said Sunday night.

Speaking to about 3,000 delegates at the 73rd General Assembly of United Jewish Communities, Shalom was referring to the theme of this year's conference – "Imagine" – which underscored the talks at both opening-day plenaries. The scheduled speaker, Israeli Prime Minster Ariel Sharon, was unable to attend.

Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom

The annual mega-meeting, which brings together Jewish leaders from all over North America, kicked off Sunday afternoon at the Cleveland Convention Center with a plenary session featuring, among others, Israeli Olympic gold medallist Gal Fridman, African American Jewish gospel singer Joshua Nelson and Los Angeles rabbi and author David Wolpe. MC Joshua Malina of television's The West Wing, a day school alumnus, told the audience he says the Shema every night with his young daughter, and Modeh Ani [the traditional Jewish prayer of gratitude on waking] every morning.

Malina said the good United Jewish Communities does is "staggering," citing $2 billion (US) raised last year for local needs, Israel and overseas Jewish communities.

Hebrew for Parents

TORONTO — Beit Rayim Synagogue and School in Richmond Hill, Ont., is joining some 30 North American shuls in a new effort to teach parents about Judaism while their kids attend congregational school. The U.S.-based National Jewish Outreach Program's "Great Jewish Parenting Challenge" features free courses on Jewish history and reading Hebrew. It overlaps with the NJOP's annual "Read Hebrew America/Canada" drive, which has taught 175,000 Jews to read Hebrew since 1989. Groups taking part this year can be found in Kingston, Fredericton, Barrie, London and other Canadian cities.

CALGARY — Nadia Boyko, 77, of Calgary accepted a Righteous Among the Nations Award from Yad Vashem last month on behalf of her deceased parents, Peter and Lidia Boyko, for their efforts to hide Jews in Kiev after the Nazis invaded Ukraine in 1941. Avraham Lev-Louis, Israeli Consul to Ontario and Western Canada, flew to Calgary to present the award at a ceremony hosted by the Calgary Jewish Community Council, acting on Yad Vashem's behalf. Boyko was joined by her family and many members of the Ukrainian community, the Jewish Free Press reported.

Praying for Arafat

PARIS — Three rabbis of Neturei Karta, a fringe haredi group that opposes Israel's existence, joined Arabs praying for Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's recovery at a vigil outside the French hospital where he eventually died. "We are here to express our solidarity with our Muslim brothers and sisters," Moishe Arye Friedmann, a Neturei Karta member from Austria, said Nov. 6. While numbering only a few hundred people, the sect has drawn attention by regularly siding with anti-Zionists.

Crying Over Arafat

LONDON — The BBC received at least 500 complaints after one of its broadcasters said she "started to cry" when an ill Yasser Arafat left for a Paris hospital. Barbara Plett, BBC's Middle East correspondent, reported Oct. 30 on a BBC radio program about her impressions of the Palestinian Authority president's departure. "When the helicopter carrying the frail old man rose above his ruined compound, I started to cry," she said. BBC sources were quoted as saying that Plett realized her words were a misjudgment. Jewish groups have long accused the BBC of pro-Palestinian bias.

Fawning Over Arafat

PARIS — French people regard Yasser Arafat as a hero rather than a terrorist, a new poll says. Asked to choose whether the Palestinian Authority president is a "hero of national resistance" or a terrorist, 43 per cent chose the former and 27 per cent the latter. Ten per cent said Arafat fit both categories, and nine per cent said he fit neither. The poll, taken for the Liberation newspaper and a national public radio station, also found three times as many French hold Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon responsible for Mideast violence as Arafat. As well, 34 per cent said they had more sympathy for the Palestinians, as opposed to 13 per cent for Israel. A poll in 2000 found almost equal sympathy for both sides.

Vatican Files Opened

ROME — The Vatican is opening up more of its archives on the Inquisition as part of an unprecedented study of the Catholic Church's attempt to control religious belief and its effect on medieval and modern history. Under the project, unveiled last week, the Church will co-operate with Italy's culture ministry and universities to catalogue documents on the Inquisition, in which people branded as heretics were killed. The Spanish Inquisition, founded in 1478, led to the expulsion of the country's Muslims and Jews in 1492.

German Jews Mark Kristallnacht

BERLIN — Several hundred people gathered in Berlin to mark the 66th anniversary of the Nazis' Kristallnacht pogrom.

The meeting took place in the Jewish community centre built on the site of a shul that was burned down on Nov. 9 and 10, 1938, when bands of Nazis and their sympathizers destroyed synagogues and Jewish shops across Germany and Austria. Some 100 Jews were killed and thousands sent to concentration camps, foreshadowing the Holocaust.

Speakers at the meeting discussed the recent gains by right-wing extremist parties.

Also in Germany, the country's main Jewish leader broke ground last Tuesday for a new synagogue in Gelsenkirchen to replace one burned down on the same day 66 years earlier.

Rebuilding the shul on the same site where it once stood shows that "a new beginning was possible in Germany," said Paul Spiegel, the head of Germany's Central Council of Jews.

Some 600 Jews live in Gelsenkirchen, a city in western Germany's Ruhr Valley, compared to 1,800 before 1938.

Jewish War Veterans Memorial planned for Toronto

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Jewish war veterans in Canada are on the march.

Late last month, after years of talks, the city of Toronto agreed to provide land in Earl Bales Park for a Canadian first: A memorial to Jewish war veterans the world over.

The bonus is that the sweeping design, consisting of an amphitheatre and stage ringed on one side by a wall that soars outward at a sharp angle, is the brainchild of world-renowned architect Daniel Libeskind, hailed as a genius for his work on the Jewish Museum in Berlin, the redevelopment of the World Trade Center site and the new wing of the Royal Ontario Museum.

"He leaped at the chance," says Lou VanDelman, executive director of Jewish War Veterans of Canada (Toronto Post). "He creates spiritual spaces, and this will be one of them."

The grandiose project will be situated about 250 metres north of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial, which is ringed by the Jewish Holocaust Wall of Remembrance. Both are near a bust of Swedish World War II hero Raoul Wallenberg.

It's a far cry from the days when the old York Downs golf course on the site of the current park did not admit Jews.

Set back from Bathurst Street, the Jewish War Veterans Memorial will soar 25 metres into the sky. A sunken amphitheatre will seat about 350 people. Jutting out in dramatic fashion on one side will be a gradually ascending wall topped by chanukiyah lights. Slicing through the middle of the wall is an arrow-like structure that carries the "shamash," which will act as an eternal flame.

A Wall of Remembrance will be inscribed with names of Jewish war veterans from the world over, while the Wall of Honour will carry the names of important battles in which Jewish veterans fought, including those in Israel's wars. The flags of 26 Allied nations will fly, as will insignias of various branches of the armed services.

The effect is breathtaking. But why the Chanukah theme?

Principle, not expedience

From the editor's desk

All of us, at one time or another, have chosen to act on the basis of expedience rather than on principle. Generally, we justify doing so for the sake of trying to achieve a higher good in the long run, or a lesser but still positive reward in the short run. Such is life: a perpetual crossroad of difficult choices. We understand the occasional need to behave expediently.

But we also understand the danger to our integrity when our preference for expedience over principle is more than merely occasional, when expedience constantly trumps principle in pursuit of ephemeral self-interest.

It is no less the case in the behaviour of nations. Public policy based only on expedience, devoid of principle, inevitably taints the policy-maker and alienates the public in whose name such policy is executed.

Canada stands for certain high and noble principles. We live our lives by them. We point to them as the morally defining and legally authoritative features of our society. They are enshrined in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, that begins: "Whereas Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law."

In 34 ensuing sections, the document prescribes our rights and freedoms. Section 2 defines our fundamental freedoms.

"Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:
(a) freedom of conscience and religion;
(b) freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication;
(c) freedom of peaceful assembly; and
(d) freedom of association."

Sections 3 to 23 defines our rights.

We are justifiably proud of and zealous to protect our rights and freedoms. They are also a kinship with other democracies around the world that usually share with us some variation of our own rights and freedoms.

It is therefore perplexing to the point of pique to hear, yet again, Canadian foreign service diplomats urging the government to spurn principle in favour of expedience regarding Canada's voting record at the United Nations on matters between the Arab world and Israel.

The latest warning away from principled voting came from former Canadian ambassador to Israel Michael Bell.

During the coverage last week on CBC's Newsworld of former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's burial, Bell offered the following opinion on Canada's role in the conflict.

"What I'm concerned with, in a way, is some discussion that I've heard about Canada changing its voting policy on UN resolutions. In other words, instead of abstaining on resolutions critical of Israel we'll start to vote against them, and I think that would be a very unfortunate thing were it to happen because it will just serve to discredit us in the eyes of Palestinians and other Arabs. In other words, we won't have the same legitimacy. We won't be seen as fair-minded in the same way if we start effectively changing our policy, which we will be if we start changing votes in the UN, so that when Canada becomes involved, when Canada has something to offer, they'll say, 'Ah, but you're the guys that are changing your votes in favour of Israel.' So I think that's a very, very important thing to keep in mind.

"The government may want to change in response to domestic constituencies. [For domestic constituencies read the Jewish lobby.] I can understand that; I don't agree with it. I can understand it."

It is both sad and alarming that Bell perpetuates the same expedient but morally unprincipled line of thought and of action that panders to the possibility of "not being seen as fair-minded in the Arab world."

It is an approach that never asks: what is the substantively correct thing to do? What is the principled thing to do having regard to the rigged UN voting process and more importantly, to our own framework of values and beliefs, as embodied in our Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

The approach Bell advocates is clearly and brazenly expedient, that is, for the sake of not discrediting Canadian policy "in the eyes of Palestinians and other Arabs." But what has our "credit" in Arab and other Muslim eyes won for us to date? Has it won any abatement in Syria's support for international terrorism? Has it won any commitment by Arab states to include Israel in the regional committees at the UN? Has it won a shift in Arab bloc policy toward more activism in the conflict in Darfur? Did it even win the extradition to Canada or fair prosecution in Iran of the person or persons who murdered photo journalist Zahra Kazemi?

Expedient voting has won us no favour in the Arab world. Is it not time therefore, for our own sake and for the sake of supporting a fellow democracy, that Canada vote at the UN in a manner that is more principled, that affirms the very rights and freedoms that we have enshrined in our constitution?

It was an obvious concession to expedience rather than to principle that was at the heart of the decision to send Foreign Minister Pierre Pettigrew to Arafat's funeral. And that is why it sparked so many expressions of offence and disappointment within the Jewish and wider community.

El Al may increase prices to cover landing fees

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

El Al Israel Airlines is considering boosting ticket prices on its Toronto to Tel Aviv route to cover the soaring landing fees being charged to carriers using Pearson International Airport.

Passengers could see their ticketed price increase by $100 to $200 depending on the season they fly, said Stanley Morais, general manager of El Al's Canadian operations. That would bring the fares charged passengers flying to Israel to between $1,700 and $1,800 during high season, and $1,300 and $1,400 during low season.

The ticket premium would serve to merely cover costs that are attributable to the higher landing fees, and would come on the heels of a fare increase last year that reflected the first major increase in landing fees demanded by the Greater Toronto Airport Authority (GTAA).

Increased 28 per cent this year

Airlines, including El Al, have complained to the GTAA, a non-profit corporation that operates Pearson Airport, that two recent increases in landing fees are exorbitant and unjustifiable. Landing fees increased by 29 per cent in 2003 and a further 28 per cent this year.

Data provided by the office of Jim Peterson, the minster for international trade, indicated fees charged at Pearson are the fifth highest in the world.

The airport authority has responded to criticism by saying it needs the fees to cover the costs of Pearson's new $3.6 billion terminal, which is part of $4.4 billion in capital improvements at the airport.The airport authority also argues that the fees help provide improved services to passengers.

But Morais, who serves as chair of the Association of Airline Representatives in Canada (AARC), said the rise in fees comes at a time that the airline industry as a whole is in financial difficulty due to reduced traffic and soaring fuel prices. (Air Canada, for one, recently emerged from bankruptcy protection.)

"The airline industry is questioning the GTAA," Morais said. "If we can cut back, we'd expect the same from our partners."

Morais said he recently met with Peterson and colleagues in the airline industry have met with other Liberal MPs. They hope to impress on the legislators the airlines' concerns about the surging fees and to suggest that the government consider reducing the rents it charges to the airport authority, in the hope the savings will be passed on to airlines.

In addition, the airlines have suggested that the GTAA be reorganized to increase the accountability of its board, as well as to include a director that represents the airline industry.

"The board of the GTAA is out of touch with the financial needs of the airline industry," said Morais.

"It is important to have well functioning airports, but the question is, on whose backs?" he said.

Airlines have begun to adapt to the higher landing fees, which are based on aircraft tonnage, by using smaller planes. El Al flies into Toronto using Boeing 767s, as opposed to the heftier 747 models, Morais said.

But El Al retains the option of avoiding Pearson altogether if the route proves financially unsustainable, he said. The alternative would be to ask its passengers to fly to New York on another carrier and board El Al's aircraft at JFK. Other airlines might also pull out of Pearson, creating an economic ripple effect that would hurt the hospitality industry, he said.

Jacquie LaRocque, a spokesperson for Peterson, said the minister is aware of the "legitimate concerns affecting trade and the day to day work of business in the Greater Toronto Area."

Although she would not comment on the meeting with Morais, LaRocque said, "Does the minister want to see El Al in Toronto? Absolutely."

Irene Marcheterre, director of communications for Transport Minister Jean Lapierre, said that the minister "has said he will look at airport rents. This is a concern because we have all kinds of leases at the airport, so he will consider the stakeholders."

Anti-Israel school presentation under investigation

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

An ARCfest presentation at two Toronto high schools is currently under investigation by the Toronto District School Board (TDSB).

According to ARCfest literature, the intent of its five-day human rights arts festival, which ran from Oct. 9 to 16, was to explore human rights issues within Canada. The festival included an educational outreach program for high school students organized with Face in the Crowd Collective, a group of artists who use artistic expression to promote social change.

The presentation, which appeared at Earl Haig Secondary School, used rap and poetry to present various issues related to equity and equal rights.

Students at the school were told they could choose to attend a morning or afternoon assembly about the female side of equality, and that poetry and rap would be used to explore "herstory," said Seth Buchman, a Grade 11 student at Earl Haig.

Percussions, hand drums, poetry and rap were used to teach about the importance of looking at equity issues from various perspectives. But then at the very end of the program, a Palestinian woman presented a rap about Palestinian oppression at the hands of the Israelis, Buchman said.

As a member of the equity design committee and the clubs and funds representative at Earl Haig, Buchman said he been taught that the way to support peace and diversity is through dialogue. However, the assembly ended right after the Palestinian woman finished her presentation and no other perspective was presented.

"Where was the dialogue? All they did was present Israel's wrongdoings. They were definitely not trying to promote peace," Buchman said.

ARCfest's intention was to explore Canadian human rights issues and inspire debate and discussion using art as an entry point, said Josh Bloch, one of the ARCfest co-ordinators.

"The goal wasn't to explore Israeli-Palestinian issues." However, part of the Canadian experience includes refugees and that is when international human rights scenes are invoked, Bloch said.

In this particular instance, Bloch said, it was unfortunate that there was no forum provided after the presentation for discussion and dialogue.

Canadian Jewish Congress, which asked the TDSB to investigate, said that from the description, it appears that the Palestinian rap was not about Middle East politics or Israeli government policy but about the evils of Israelis as a people.

The Arcfest program was "inflammatory, one-sided and highly prejudicial," said CJC spokesperson Simon Rosenblum.

"Even in a non-educational setting, it would be outrageous, but in a public school environment, the program passes for pedagogy and is beyond acceptability."

Buchman's mother, Gail Baker, herself a school principal, wonders how a program like this could ever get into a school.

The festival received a letter of endorsement from City of Toronto Councillor Olivia Chow as well as from the Ontario Human Rights Commission.

The OHRC letter stated that "the festival will serve an important role in raising public awareness and encouraging debate and discussion about the status of human rights within Canada."

"Human rights issues are always controversial. This one is especially sensitive," said Francois Larsen, the director of the OHRC.

However, "before I withdraw my support from the festival I would want to conduct my own investigation," Larsen added.

ARCfest's educational program was also presented at the Program for Expelled Students in Scarborough, where, according to festival co-ordinators, it was very well received.

Non-partisan network combats child poverty

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canada is one of the world's richest countries, yet 1.1 million Canadian children, or one in six, live in the squalor of poverty.

And that dismays Laurel Rothman, the national co-ordinator of Campaign 2000 – a non-partisan network of more than 85 national, regional and local organizations committed to implementing a 1989 all-party House of Commons resolution to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000.

Rothman, a social worker employed by the Family Service Association of Toronto, does not realistically expect to end child poverty any time soon.

But she would be immensely pleased if Canada's current rate of child poverty, 15.6 per cent, could be scaled down to about five per cent, matching that of Scandinavian nations like Sweden and Denmark.

"That would make us a world leader in terms of combating child poverty," said Rothman, a mother of three. "But it will take a more comprehensive and co-ordinated strategy to bring the rate down to five per cent or less."

Laurel Rothman

It may come as a surprise to some that the child poverty rate in Canadian Jewish households is close to that of the general community. "There are more poor Jewish children than people think."

Judging by figures taken from the 2001 census, 13 per cent of Canadian Jewish children up to the age of 14 find themselves in that dire situation.

And in Israel, the rate of child poverty is 28.1 per cent, according to the National Insurance Institute. Three weeks ago, Israel's Ministry of Health reported that 20 per cent of Israeli children go to bed hungry.

Despite the gloomy statistics, Rothman is not completely distraught, at least as far as Canada is concerned.

In the throne speech early last month, the federal government pledged to enact an ambitious child-care program, and that leaves Rothman somewhat optimistic.

"It's pointing in the right direction," she observed in an interview. "We'll see what they come up with. We're encouraged."

She added that Ottawa's proposals have the potential to be the equivalent of a Canada Health Act for children, provided legislation is passed and leadership is shown.

Campaign 2000, however, is not sitting still. On Nov. 24, it plans to issue its 2004 Report Card on Child Poverty in Canada.

Broadly speaking, the report will state that the incidence of child poverty basically remains the same as it was three decades ago.

"We're stuck structurally," Rothman said, lamenting the fact that the poverty rate has actually increased since 1996. "We need to make significant investments in child care."

Child poverty, which largely affects single parents and aboriginals, stems from a variety of factors.

The heart of the matter is that Canada is not producing enough jobs with decent salaries. "We're a low-wage country, as is the United States [whose child poverty rate stands at about 22 per cent]."

The problem is that one in four Canadian workers earns less than $10 an hour. What is needed, among other things, is a higher minimum wage, an increase in child benefits, a system of early childhood care and affordable housing, Rothman noted.

And if Canada fails to act, the consequences could be disastrous.

"We need resources to raise healthy, resilient children so they can be effective citizens and workers," said Rothman, who brings 30 years of experience to the community service field. "We'll be paying the price if we don't do that."

Children who grow up in poverty are susceptible to more illnesses, struggle with more mental health problems, perform poorly in school and earn less as adults.

And research proves that for every dollar a nation invests in giving children a good start in life, $7 in health care costs are saved.

Rothman, 58, has been associated with Campaign 2000 for the past seven years.

Its goals are four-fold: to raise and protect the basic living standards of families across Canada so that no child must endure poverty; to improve the life chances of all Canadian children; to ensure that secure, affordable and suitable housing is available to all children; and to create, build and strengthen family support, child care and community-based resources to empower families to provide the best possible care for their children.

Campaign 2000's partners include the Canadian Institute of Child Care, Canadian Teachers' Federation and the Ontario Coalition for Better Child Care.

Rothman, who was born in Cleveland and completed her education at the University of Pittsburgh, immigrated to Canada in 1971 after her husband, Mitchell, an economist, accepted a job offer.

At the Family Service Association, she devotes two-thirds of her time to Campaign 2000 and the rest to immigrant issues.

"I've always been interested in social justice issues," she said, explaining that her involvement in child care started in the mid-1970s when one of her children was enrolled at York University's day care.

Israel must still be wary

The grout on the seams of Yasser Arafat's concrete tomb had barely dried before world leaders were already planning their diplomatic offensive to induce Israel and the Palestinians to get peace talks back on the path set out in the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan.

While in Washington last week to congratulate President George W. Bush on his re-election, British Prime Minister Tony Blair set the tone. "We meet at a crucial time, where it is important that we revitalize and reinvigorate the search for a genuine, lasting, and just peace in the Middle East," Blair told reporters.

Though more cautious than his British guest, Bush also enthused over the new possibility brought by Arafat's death. "The months ahead offer a new opportunity to make progress toward a lasting peace, and we look forward to working with a Palestinian leadership that is committed to fighting terror and committed to the cause of democratic reform."

The foreign ministries in the United States, Europe and the Middle East have suddenly become very busy. U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell announced that he will visit Egypt on Nov. 22. On Saturday, Egypt's Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit said he would travel to Israel on Nov. 24, accompanied by the chief of Egyptian intelligence, Omar Suleiman. Also on Saturday, France's foreign minister, Michel Barnier, said an independent Palestinian state should be created as soon as possible. "I think it is possible to create, perhaps even with temporary borders, this Palestinian state, which is one of the conditions for peace and security for all the countries in this region," Barnier told a radio news program. And, not surprisingly, it has been announced London that British Foreign Minister Jack Straw is also expected to visit the region in the coming weeks.

To be sure, it is very important that Israel not lose any bona fide opportunity to advance the peace process and that it try to encourage and foster, where possible, the development of a truly moderate and effective leadership among the Palestinians. But as we have seen in the past, diplomatic offensives, especially involving European leaders, tend to translate into new political and other pressures upon the Jewish state.

Israel must first assess the new Palestinian leadership before it stakes out its own responses to the diplomatic manoeuvring. Some aspects of the post-Arafat landscape may not be that different from the arid, poisoned terrain of the past four years. For example, Farouk Kaddoumi, the new head of Fatah, the largest constituent of the PLO, has promised that the Palestinian leadership "would continue to march forward along Arafat's path, and along the path of the successes he managed to bring his people." If that is true, and if Kaddoumi has any influence, no peace initiative will be able to grow among the Palestinians.

Israel must indeed step onto the new Palestinian landscape, but until it sees what has been planted there by its new leaders, it must do so warily and slowly.

Arafat's true legacy

No one expects that in the immediate future Palestinians will acquire the right of freedom of speech and the ability to criticize their leaders without fear of being murdered. When that day comes, it will be interesting to see an honest assessment of the life of Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat as the so-called father of the Palestine Liberation Organization. He gave birth to airplane hijackings, the murder of Israeli athletes at Munich, civil wars in Jordan and Lebanon and the creation of terrorists groups that fostered suicide bombers who murdered innocent men, women and children and celebrated those despicable acts as a glorification of their nationhood.

An honest history will relate the many missed opportunities that a true leader would have pursued. When former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak offered Arafat all of Gaza, 92 per cent of the West Bank and a capital in east Jerusalem – the best deal that the Palestinians ever let slip away – there was not even a counterproposal. Instead, the second intifadah was initiated.

The millions, or perhaps even billions, that Arafat stole from the ordinary Palestinians, most of whom live in abject poverty, will someday reveal the selfishness and greed of an autocratic egotist. The revelation of Arafat's flunkies who were bribed with palatial homes and Swiss bank accounts will one day persuade the Palestinians how they were duped, cheated and misled.

Arafat was aided and abetted by Syria, Lebanon, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, regimes that all confine Palestinian refugees to filthy and diseased camps, not allowing the refugees to better themselves so that their plight can be used as a propaganda weapon against Israel. The terrorism that Arafat nurtured and funded may yet create the catalyst for civil disobedience and revolution amongst the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza. While never really endorsing the concept of a two-state solution, Arafat aimed to demoralize and to destroy the State of Israel.

In the end, he led his people into a miserable existence beset by poverty and unemployment, and with no viable infrastructure with which to create a Palestinian State. He lied to them, cheated them and led them into the miserable state in which most Palestinians now exist. This is the true legacy of Arafat, not the fawning misrepresentations of his life that were given by French President Jacques Chirac and United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan.

He could have been a George Washington to his people, but instead ended his life in the same league as the Saddam Husseins and Adolf Hitlers of the world.

Regrets statements

The statements I made on the Michael Coren Show (originally aired Oct. 19, 2004) unfortunately implied that violence against innocent Palestinians is justifiable ("B'nai Brith Canada criticized for official's terror remarks," CJN, Nov. 11). I have retracted that statement (and any others) that made this implication, since that was never my intent, and I have apologized.

Unfortunately, the context in which my statements was made is not presented in your article. During the show, the panelists had agreed that, at least for purposes of our discussion, terrorism was any deed intended to force (that is to say "terrify"), a population into choosing or avoiding a certain course of action. Under this extremely (and perhaps overly) broad definition, some forms of self-defence and general deterrence could be classified as terrorist actions. As such, I would point out that by this definition most, if not all, states are guilty of state-sponsored "terrorism."

However, the discussion of classifying an action as terrorist is irrelevant. The real question is whether an action is right or wrong. When we involve ourselves in the discussion of semantics, we allow the Palestinians to paint Israel with the politically emotive term of terrorism. We must ignore this smokescreen and bring the discussion back to the crucial question of morality. It is morally wrong to kill innocents and it is morally right to defend innocents. As Jews, we hold ourselves to a high moral standard, and we should hold the rest of the world to a similar standard.

My point on the show was that the destruction of property – not people – to save innocent lives may be justifiable even if it qualifies as terrorism under this definition. As opposed to Canadian Islamic Congress president Mohamed Elmasry's comments, which justify the murder of any Israeli over the age of 18, I neither advocate, nor rationalize, the use of violence against innocent civilians in any way.

Jewish connections to China

Thank you for publishing the informative article "Jewish studies and a horah, in China" by Morton Weinfeld (Nov. 4). Weinfeld wrote about a conference that he attended in China that was organized by Jewish studies expert Prof. Xu Xin of Nanjing University in China.

Weinfeld wrote about the great interest among many scholars in China in Jews and Jewish history, and that Chinese scholars are researching the "few direct Jewish connections to China." As examples of such connections, Weinfeld mentioned the Jewish community in Kaifeng, China, which he stated "originated several hundred years ago," as well as the later Jewish community in Shanghai.

I wish to point out that the Jewish community in the Kaifeng region is actually known to be much older. In fact, as Xu Xin himself points out in his book entitled The Jews of Kaifeng, China: History, Culture and Religion, Jews likely settled in this region at some point during the northern Song dynasty, from 960 to 1126 CE, most likely arriving via overland route from Persia, along China's "Silk Road."

In addition, there is another direct Jewish connection to China that Weinfeld did not mention. North American Jewish families have been travelling to China and adopting orphaned girls in China in ever-increasing numbers over the past decade. Xu Xin, during a meeting with several such adoptive families earlier this year in Toronto, recognized that these Jewish Chinese children and their families are creating a Jewish connection to China that is both novel and fascinating.

Perhaps these new members of the Jewish community will help re-establish a formal Jewish connection to China.

A timeline of Yasser Arafat's life

The timeline of Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's life also traces a dark line of suffering and mourning for the families and friends of his many victims. On Nov. 13, 1974, as PLO leader, Arafat addressed the General Assembly of the United Nations. He told the gathering he was "bearing an olive branch and a freedom fighter's gun. Do not let the olive branch fall from my hand." Six months earlier, his colleagues in the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine trained their freedom fighters' guns on the children of a high school in Ma'alot in northern Israel, killing 21. In the photo above, one of the injured students is rescued by her brother. Below, a father grieves for his son, who was killed by a PLO terrorist in 1993. Below left, a young girl sobs in memory of her friends who were killed by two suicide bombers in 1996. Top left, a police officer moves an empty baby carriage from the rubble of a terroist attack in Petah Tikva in 1977.

The following is a timeline of the life of Yasser Arafat, the president of the Palestinian Authority who died last week at age 75:

• 1929: Arafat is born to a family of merchants in Egypt (though he often claimed to have been born in Jerusalem);

• 1952-1956: Attends Cairo University, where he joins the Islamist movement known as the Muslim Brotherhood. Also organizes the Union of Palestinian Students;

• 1956: Arafat has said he fights in the Egyptian army during the Suez War, but some believe he was in Czechoslovakia, attending a Communist-sponsored student congress;

• 1957: He leaves Egypt and a year later settles in Kuwait, where he works as an engineer;

• Late 1950s: Co-founds Fatah, a Palestinian political movement dedicated to armed struggle against Israel;

• 1964: The PLO is founded at an Arab League summit. Fatah will soon become its central element;

• 1965: Fatah carries out its first terrorist attack on Israel, an attempt to blow up the National Water Carrier.

• 1968: Losses the PLO inflicts on Israeli soldiers at the battle of Karameh, in Jordan, and Arafat's daring escape from the battle on a motorcycle add to his mystique and solidify his growing hold on the PLO;

• 1969: Arafat is elected chairman of the PLO's executive committee;

• 1970: PLO attempts to destabilize and ultimately take over Jordan prompt King Hussein to crack down on the PLO and kick it out of the country. Thousands of Palestinians are killed in what comes to be known as Black September. Arafat chooses Lebanon as his new base of operations.

• 1972: Palestinian terrorists kill 11 Israeli athletes at the Munich Olympics. The attack and other terrorist actions, mainly airplane hijackings, put the Palestinian cause on the international stage;

• 1974: Wearing a pistol, Arafat addresses the UN General Assembly. The assembly recognizes "the right of the Palestinian people to sovereignty and national independence" and gives the PLO observer status at the world organization;

• 1982: Israeli forces drive Arafat from Beirut, forcing him to set up his base in Tunisia;

• 1987-1993: Riots break out that grow into the first Palestinian intifadah, or uprising. The fighting eventually claims the lives of an estimated 1,100 Palestinians and 150 Israelis;

• 1988: Arafat says the PLO accepts U.N. Resolution 242, implies recognition of Israel and, at least formally, renounces terrorism. As a result, the United States opens a dialogue with the PLO;

• 1990: The United States breaks off its dialogue with the PLO after Arafat refuses to condemn a terrorist attack carried out by a member group. Arafat's support for Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein after he invades Kuwait, and during the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq the following year, leads Persian Gulf states to cut off their funding for the PLO;

• 1991: Arafat marries his 28-year-old secretary Suha Tawil. Born a Christian, she converts to Islam;

• 1993: Israel and the PLO agree on a framework for peace in what later are called the Oslo accords. The framework is signed on the White House lawn, where Arafat shakes hands with then Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin;

• 1994: Arafat, along with Israeli leaders Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres, is awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. Arafat returns to the Gaza Strip after a 25-year exile;

• 1996: Arafat is overwhelmingly elected president of the Palestinian Authority. Under heavy pressure, the PLO's parliament-in-exile votes to revoke sections of the PLO charter calling for Israel's destruction, but never completes the process;

• 2000: Arafat refuses a peace plan proposed by then Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak at the Camp David summit. Later that year, Palestinians begin a wave of terrorism that intensifies after a visit to Jerusalem's Temple Mount by then Israeli opposition leader Ariel Sharon. This grows into what is called the second intifadah, which is still ongoing;

• 2001: Frustrated by Arafat's ongoing support for violence, Israel confines him to his compound in Ramallah, where he remains until October 2004.

• 2002: The United States breaks with Arafat after he is found to have lied about PA involvement with a weapons ship arriving from Iran. U.S. President George W. Bush later makes replacement of leaders "compromised by terrorism" – a clear nod to Arafat – a precondition for Palestinian statehood;

• 2004: Arafat dies on Nov. 11 in a Paris hospital.

On child sacrifice

Do we sacrifice our children as Abraham once tried to do with Isaac?

On Rosh Hashanah and again this month, we read of the intended sacrifice of Isaac. The Akedah, the binding of Isaac (Genesis 22), is a troubling story that permeates our history.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

How could Abraham attempt such a thing? Why would God ask it of him? The story resonates with a challenge to our religious and ethical sensibilities. And in this day of suicide bombings, I wonder about the connection between past sacrifices and current practices. I wonder how a parent can condone or participate in such an act.

There are many interpretations of the Akedah narrative. Perhaps that's the reason for its inclusion in our High Holy Day liturgy: it offers fertile substance for rabbinic homilies and midrashim. Some interpreters say it's a morality tale about the evils of child sacrifice. But that practice was not the norm then, and the explanation is too simplistic. Furthermore, why repeat the story on Rosh Hashanah, and why would God initiate the process? What is the message?

So I ask, "Do we sacrifice our children?" Is that the moral of the story? Are we to be like Abraham, ready to offer our children to God?

Before you dismiss the question, hear me out. If by sacrifice we mean the literal process of killing, of course we don't do it and that is not our purpose. And although over the millennia, Jewish children were sacrificed, dying horrible deaths, we did not welcome such acts. That is not my meaning, nor is it our narrative understanding.

By remembering Abraham and Isaac's willingness to submit, we seek their intercession on our behalf, in order to be incorporated into their redemptive merit. But we also seek to emulate, in some small way, their dedication. We seek, as adults and as parents, to model and impart the lessons of fidelity and devotion, of submitting oneself to God – to some greater purpose.

In raising our children to be Jewish, do we offer them up to some noble cause? Surely by cultivating their Jewishness, we mark them as different from other nations. Is this not also a form of bonding to a cause, like an offering or a sacrifice – the giving of oneself unreservedly. Do we not wish to teach our children the value of personal dedication and the significance of national commitment.

We willingly sacrifice much for our values, for our identity. We willingly surrender our children to these goals – to live by them, not destroy life for them.

Isaac was literally bound on the altar. Do we not follow that lesson figuratively and bind our children on the altar of Jewishness? Is that not the message of the Akedah? Is that not our intention?

Marrying into an age-old story

I am quite exhausted. Maybe it's the experience of being a new grandparent, or perhaps it's the result of the dancing we did at our younger daughter's recent wedding. Yes, this has been a very busy year. There are still two months to go in 2004 – what comes next? It's hard to imagine what could equal the year that has been.

We are now poring over photographs from our daughter's wedding in Winnipeg last month. My favourites are not the standard pictures of bride, groom and grinning parents, although those will be great to add to our wedding collection.

My choices are a bit more off-centre.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

The first was taken at the bedeken ceremony. Rabbi Alan Green of Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, conducted the ceremony in which the ketubah is signed by two witnesses and the groom checks to make sure he is getting the right bride. The rabbi asked the couple to look carefully at each other, so that they would truly see the person they were marrying.

How many of us thought about that when we got married? I loved the concept of asking the couple to look deeply into each other's eyes. The photographs show that my daughter and her groom took this instruction very seriously – and were pleased at what they saw.

Another favourite picture is one that shows us taking our daughter to the chupah to be met by her soon-to-be husband. There is no doubt that this was – and is – one happy woman. The groom was no less sure he had made the right choice. Her mother and father look pretty pleased, too.

We also like one of the bride and her siblings hugging for all they are worth, each one for that moment entirely supportive of the others in joy.

The last I'd like to mention – I might find more when I see others that are still being sent to me – is one of the bride and groom wrapped in each others' arms for a dance just before we hoisted them up on chairs for a rocky ride.

We also observed a custom that I have come to love. I don't know where it started, but it should be a part of every wedding. Both my husband's parents and my parents have died, as has the groom's mother, but we knew they would have loved every minute of the wedding. So in addition to a picture of the bride and groom, on which everyone could write their greetings, we displayed both our parents' wedding pictures, as well as pictures of the groom's mother and grandparents. An added joy for all of us was that his grandmother – a radiant bride and still as beautiful now as she was then – was with us to witness her grandson's marriage. We had the real person, not just a picture, to rejoice with. She is a regal lady, every inch the matriarch.

This week we read Vayetzei, in which Jacob sets out – flees, actually – to his uncle Laban. In that household, he will meet and marry Rachel, the love of his life, as well as her sister Leah and, finally, two concubines.

We already know how the story ends: with relationships among his offspring fraught with jealousy, hatred, deceit, lust and, finally, forgiveness and reconciliation. Surely no modern soap opera or reality show can match the drama of Jacob and his family. When we talk about the merit of our ancestors, we are certainly not referring to the parenting skills of Jacob, who should have had a few good books to help him out. We are talking about their relationships with God and their unwavering commitment to establishing the Jewish people.

But all of that lies in Jacob's future. In Haran, Jacob married Rachel, the woman he would love forever, and his love for her resonates across the centuries. The bedeken ceremony that we still practise, and those moments when the bride and groom confirm their commitment by looking deeply into each other's eyes, remind us of Jacob's lifetime love for his twice-purchased bride.

I wish for my daughter that she, too, has found the man who will be her true help-mate, and that their commitment and love will bind them together for a lifetime.

Addressing historical injustices

Most justice systems recognize the importance of providing some form of compensation to those who have been wronged.

Following the Holocaust, individual survivors and the State of Israel received reparations from Germany as a form of compensation for arguably the most malevolent, systematic and darkest chapter in human history. Reparations, of course, could never truly serve as compensation for the horrors cruelly meted out to European Jews. But to a minor degree, there is a sense of justice being served by the largely symbolic notion of the payment of reparations by the perpetrators of the Holocaust.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

On a far different scale, our own Canadian history is rife with examples of government action that led to racial discrimination being committed against vulnerable minorities.

These include the forced assimilation and abuse of aboriginal children in residential schools; the Chinese Head Tax and Exclusion Acts; the imprisonment of lepers (mostly of Chinese origin) on two Victoria area islands; the unjust treatment of blacks from the Caribbean; the internment of Ukrainian Canadians during World War I; the internment of Italian and German Canadians during World War II; the internment, confiscation of property and deportation of Japanese Canadians during and after World War II; and the denial of benefits to aboriginal war veterans.

These instances gave rise to grievances against the government, including lawsuits and claims for redress. Although there has been some recent success in relation to aboriginal residential school claims, only the claims by Japanese Canadians were ultimately successful.

That 1988 landmark settlement with Japanese Canadians included a formal apology and acknowledgment of unjust treatment and violation of human rights, as well as monetary compensation to eligible individuals and to the Japanese Canadian community. Out of that settlement, the government of Canada established the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, to foster racial harmony and cross-cultural understanding and to help eliminate racism.

The Japanese Canadian redress package came during a period when other groups, including Ukrainians, Italians and Chinese Canadians, were active in their lobbying efforts for redress. These other groups were formally advised, through an announcement in the House of Commons in September 1994, that no redress of any kind would again be offered.

Sadly, for our community, the denial of entry of Jewish refugees during the Holocaust remains a dark chapter in Canadian history – a chapter outlined in the now-classic history treatise, None is Too Many: Canada and the Jews of Europe, 1933-1948 by Irving Abella and Harold Troper. At one point, the government of Canada was asked to mark this event with the installation of a plaque in Halifax to remember the more than 900 persons aboard the St. Louis who were never allowed to land in Canada in 1939. The government refused to do so.

The last official statement of federal government policy with respect to redress for victims of racial discrimination was made in March 2001. That statement outlined the multi-faceted approach Canada has taken toward remedies and redress, including the formal acknowledgment and regret with respect to historical wrongs, and the support of activities such as the production of films, academic research and other means of commemoration. Rather than providing financial compensation for past wrongs, the government preferred to invest in the future, in the creation of a more equitable society now and a better future for generations to come.

The entire notion of redress for past wrongs on the international stage has since evolved to include formal apologies, monetary payments and recently the establishment of the Truth and Reconciliation Commissions in South Africa and Sierra Leone.

In Canada, redress claims for non-racial wrongs committed by governments have been somewhat successful. These include claims related to involuntary sterilizations of persons designated as mentally retarded in Alberta, the non-testing of blood tainted with HIV/AIDS and hepatitis C when testing was available, the approval of the use of the drug thalidomide and the imprisonment of persons wrongfully convicted of murder and others.

Redress notwithstanding, hopefully, with the experience of history and the availability of various human rights and constitutional protections, these stains on Canadian history will never be repeated. However, past injustices must continue to be acknowledged. They must serve as a stark contrast to present and future eras characterized by enlightenment, awareness and moral sensitivity to issues of racial discrimination.

The Kirshner File

Yasser Arafat was an ambivalent figure

It was a telling measure of Yasser Arafat's standing among Israelis that he never visited Israel in broad daylight, even during the height of the Oslo peace process. That he could not show his face in public in Israel was indicative of two related realities. Despite his formal acceptance of Israel's existence, if not its legitimacy, Arafat never transcended his image as a Palestinian revolutionary prone to terrorism and partial to Israel's destruction. And the vocal minority of Israelis who did not come to terms with Oslo always condemned Arafat as a duplicitous enemy.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Arafat – who never earned the cachet of such courageous Arab peacemakers as Egypt's Anwar Sadat and Jordan's King Hussein – ventured into Israel only twice, both times in the dead of night. In the first instance, he travelled to the northern Tel Aviv neighbourhood of Ramat Aviv to pay his respects to Leah Rabin, whose husband, Yitzhak, the prime minister, had been assassinated by a right-wing Israeli zealot opposed to territorial compromise. But such was Arafat's reputation that he did not attend Rabin's funeral in Jerusalem. The last time he was seen in Israel, and then only fleetingly through the window of a passing car, was when he was driven through the darkened streets of western Jerusalem en route to the West Bank.

Arafat, whose death last week in France at 75 truly marked the end of an era, was a murky, ambivalent figure, even in the eyes of Israelis who thought he had sincerely reconciled himself to Israel's presence. The embodiment of modern Palestinian nationalism, he embraced the concept of a two-state solution and disavowed terrorism at the insistence of the United States and Egypt. And then, under the 1993 Declaration of Principles, which called for mutual recognition, he similarly committed himself to resolving his differences with Israel through peaceful means. But at the end of the day, Arafat broke his solemn pledges, convinced that Israel had no intention of honouring the provisions of the Oslo accords and thinking, perhaps, that Israel could be beaten into submission by attrition.

He likened Oslo to Mohammed's temporary truce with his adversaries. He proclaimed the Islamic virtues of jihad. He urged a million martyrs to march to Jerusalem. He tolerated anti-Israel and anti-Jewish incitement in the Palestinian media and in Palestinian schools. He compared Israel to Nazi Germany. He coddled Islamic fundamentalist forces such as Hamas (though at one juncture, in 1996, he arrested their leaders). He turned a blind eye to terrorism and he did not flinch from resorting to violence. And he obliquely praised suicide bombers while perfunctorily condemning their acts. Arafat compared himself to Nelson Mandela, the South African freedom fighter. But next to Mandela, Arafat was a pygmy.

When all was said and done, Arafat was either unwilling or unable to staunch the tide of terrorism that washed over Israel and the territories following the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising in September 2000. Judged by either standard, his duplicity or his weakness, he was a failure. Mediators who exerted herculean efforts to hammer out a viable ceasefire belatedly discovered that Arafat could not or would not cooperate.

Arafat's moment of truth came in July 2000, when he squandered a golden opportunity to realize his dream of creating a Palestinian state. He complained that Israel's unprecedented concessions were not really generous, yet walked away without giving his Israeli interlocutor, then prime minister Ehud Barak, a counteroffer. In anger, Barak claimed that Arafat had been "unmasked" as a poseur.

Nor was Arafat prepared to forego his demand for the right of Palestinian refugees – particularly in Lebanon – to return to their former homes in Israel. As a result, many Israelis concluded that Arafat's real objective was to defeat Israel stealthily by means of demography. But to give him his due, Arafat told Ha'aretz last June that he was ready to sign an agreement that would enable the Palestinians to establish a sovereign state in 97 per cent of the West Bank, all of the Gaza Strip, and territory gained in land swaps with Israel.

By that point, time had run out. His perennial foe, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon – an opponent of the Oslo process and a proponent of the settlement enterprise in the territories – would not negotiate with him. Sharon, having declared that he would never shake his hand, did not consider Arafat a reliable or trustworthy partner. Sharon's belief gained currency in Israel, and was supported by President George W. Bush of the United States. Sidelined and confined to his battered headquarters in Ramallah, Arafat was, nevertheless, a formidable figure with the power to determine policy and veto appointments.

In the pantheon of Palestinian heroes, Arafat stood on a high pedestal. Born in Cairo and raised in Jerusalem, he was the scion of a prominent Palestinian family. Active in Palestinian politics from his days as an engineering student, he was one of the founders of Fatah, the largest faction in the PLO. Fatah advocated armed struggle and would later be linked with the spectacular hijackings of airplanes and the 1972 Munich massacre. In 1965, he participated in Fatah's first attempted military raid inside Israel. Arafat assumed the leadership of the PLO in 1969, in the humiliating aftermath of the Six Day War, and fought off all Arab efforts to co-opt him. In 1974, a gun holster on his hip and an olive branch in his hand, he officially brought the Palestinian case to the United Nations.

Arafat, whose checkered career spanned the tenure of 10 Israeli prime ministers, was a canny survivor and an expert at extricating himself from crises. After losing his base in the West Bank and Gaza, he transferred his operations to Jordan, where he provoked the wrath of King Hussein. Arafat touched off a civil war that ended with the flight of his loyalists to Lebanon. Arafat built a mini-empire in Beirut and attacked Israel from bases in southern Lebanon. But in 1982, Israel invaded Lebanon, forcing him to flee to Tunis. Israeli aircraft bombed his headquarters in 1985, but he escaped from the ruins without a scratch. Fortune smiled on him yet again when he survived, though not unscathed, the crash of his private plane in the Libyan desert.

Yasser Arafat in the last days of his life

In triumph, after the miscalculation of supporting Saddam Hussein in the 1991 Gulf War, he returned to Gaza in 1994. Being autocratic by nature, he ran what essentially was a one-man show, brooking little criticism. Only once, last August, when he was besieged by challenges to his authority, did he finally acknowledge that he had made mistakes.

Jealously guarding his powers, he never appointed a successor, though his closest associates, Mahmoud Abbas and Ahmed Qureia, were substantial figures who played key roles in the administration of the Palestinian Authority. Two colleagues who might have succeeded him, Khalil al-Wazir and Salah Khalaf, were assassinated by Israel in 1988 and 1991, respectively.

His physical features and his mercurial outbursts notwithstanding, Arafat exuded charisma and cast a spell over his people. He inspired devotion among his followers, though they could detect flaws. He was supposedly personally incorruptible. But reports persisted that he had stashed away a fortune and that his associates and cronies were hopelessly corrupt. Meanwhile, his outspoken and much younger wife, Suha, lived in the lap of luxury with her nine-year-old daughter in Paris, while legions of Palestinians in the PA barely made ends meet. Foreign aid, some from Canada, poured into the PA, but the glowing promise of prosperity never materialized.

Arafat ruled the PA – a nest of intrigue and infighting – like a fiefdom and resisted calls for reform. The Palestinians created democratic institutions and called elections in 1996, but democracy hung by a slender thread and transparency was merely a word. The media was supervised and sometimes ruthlessly muzzled.

Chaos reigned in the PA, especially after the Israeli army occupied the Palestinian autonomous areas in the spring of 2002. Today, the PA is rife with gangs of militias that roam freely, and Arafat's successors may be hard-pressed to contain the anarchy.

Arafat fell far short of his most cherished goal, Palestinian statehood. Israel still occupies the West Bank, though Sharon is intent on withdrawing from Gaza and four isolated settlements in the West Bank. But the narrative of Palestinian independence and dignity that he tirelessly promoted, when Israel permitted him to fly around the globe like a multi-millionaire jetsetter, resounds in the Arab world, Europe, Asia, the United States, Canada and even Israel, and that will be his lasting legacy.

Several months ago, Arafat said that he would retire with the emergence of a Palestinian state. But Arafat died too soon, an eternity too soon, as far as numerous Palestinians were concerned. Still, his dream of Palestinian statehood is bound to be realized, sooner or later.

No charges laid against hecklers of pro-Israel novelist

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It appears the efforts of an author to seek legal redress for the interruption of his lecture at a Waterloo Chapters store have fizzled out.

Waterloo Regional Police have declined to charge two men with creating a disturbance after they interrupted lawyer Howard Rotberg during an in-store lecture about his pro-Israel novel. In addition, Rotberg has missed the deadline to sue Chapters over a news release that alleged he made racist statements during the verbal altercation with the two hecklers.

Rotberg said Chapters appears to be closing ranks behind the statements of its employees who have said he made comments alleging people from the Middle East are terrorists. Because of the news release alleging he made racist comments, Rotberg said he feels it is now unsafe for him to speak at public venues. Rotberg vehemently denies he made racist statements.

The incident at the heart of Rotberg's complaints took place last May during what was supposed to be a staid in-store lecture about his novel, The Second Catastrophe, which Chapters continues to carry.

About 20 minutes into his talk, two men, whom he described as an Iraqi Kurd and a Palestinian, began to heckle him and allege that his book painted all Muslims as terrorists. The event deteriorated from there and as Rotberg described it, when one of the hecklers was asked to sit down by a member of the audience, the man responded, "He's a fucking Jew."

Voices were raised and store management quickly cancelled the lecture. Rotberg insisted police be called but after questioning store employees, they refused Rotberg's request that the two hecklers be charged with creating a disturbance.

Indigo Books & Music Inc., which operates the Chapters chain, later issued a news release saying, "We are saddened that our customers witnessed inappropriate behaviour and heard racist comments both from the guest author and some of the attendees at this particular event."

Rotberg said two members of the audience, both professors, would corroborate his version of events. He also charges that Chapters allowed the two men to close down his lecture and deny him his right to free speech.

At the time of the incident, Indigo spokesperson Sorya Ingrid Gaulin said that the bookseller's staff acted to prevent violence and that the store stood behind the news release, which was based on written statements from five of its employees.

Rotberg said he has not pursued legal action against Indigo. "Based on bad advice I got from people, I decided not to sue Chapters for libel." He said he was told it would appear he was merely trying to get publicity for his book. Instead, "I tried to work co-operatively with them."

Rotberg believes the absence of support from any prominent Jewish advocacy organization hurt him in his efforts to convince police to charge the hecklers. But Bernie Farber, executive director of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, said, "I do not know what happened that day. Congress, like other Jewish organizations, is not in a position to guess at what happened without the facts."

Farber said he was confident Waterloo police investigated the case thoroughly. Congress has no basis to question their determination that charges were not warranted, he said.

West faces long war on terror, Israeli analyst says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Western societies face a long-term threat from the forces of international terrorism, an Israeli analyst warned last week.

"It won't pass away," political scientist Efraim Inbar said in a lecture at the Bloor Cinema. "We face a long war, with no peace around the corner."

In the meantime, countries grappling with terrorism should improve public security, upgrade intelligence services and spend more on defence, even if it affects their standard of living, added Inbar, who is affiliated with Bar-Ilan University's Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies.

Efraim Inbar

In the struggle against terrorism, Western democracies should co-operate with each other in a more systematic way, and they should not fear carrying out pre-emptive strikes when necessary, he said.

Neither should they shy away from occupying countries that harbour, or co-operate with, terrorists, Inbar added. "We shouldn't play games with radical ayatollahs."

Calling the war on terrorism a just cause, Inbar said that terrorists must be wiped out, because if the war is not won, anarchy will prevail.

The Sept. 11 attacks in the United States were an important warning: terrorists can inflict enormous damage without possessing weapons of mass destruction, he said.

Yet Inbar believes Sept. 11 was not "a defining moment" in history because the distribution of power in the world remains the same, with the United States exercising hegemonic power.

Compared to conventional wars, terrorism causes relatively little damage. Israel has learned to live with terrorism and contain it, he noted.

Terrorists can produce fear, panic and political paralysis, but the Western order is not in any danger of collapsing, Inbar said.

Turning to the Arab-Israeli dispute, he suggested that Israelis have learned that peace is "a beautiful dream" but not much more.

Asked to comment on the merits of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan for a unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip, Inbar said he had no clear-cut answer.

"It's a gamble, and there are pros and cons. I thank God I'm not in Sharon's place."

Inbar's talk was sponsored by the Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University and the Canadian Coalition of Democracies, a newly formed organization dedicated to fighting anti-Semitism and changing Canada's policy in the Middle East.

Plans are in the works for Jewish military museum

"I asked that too," VanDelman concedes. "Then Libeskind told me: 'What about the Maccabees?' And Chanukah means 'dedication.' It was perfect."

The memorial, under the chairmanship of Joel Wagman, will honour Canadian Jewish war veterans going back even before Confederation, Allied countries, and members of the Resistance during World War II. A good portion will be taken up by the names of the 16,000 Jews who served in World War II.

The land the memorial will occupy was dedicated in a small ceremony Oct. 31. The whole project will be owned by the city of Toronto and managed by the Jewish War Veterans of Canada.

"It will be a living memorial, a place people can go to on Remembrance Day and for educational programs," VanDelman says. "It's 50 years overdue."

Organizers are hoping to break ground next spring, with a view toward an unveiling next autumn, to be presided over by the project's main patron, Gov. Gen. Adrienne Clarkson.

Meantime, apart from relying on one chief benefactor, the war veterans are poised to go on a public campaign to raise the $5 million the memorial is expected to cost.

Call 416-736-6744 for more information.

Another grand project hopes to raise $10 million for a permanent, freestanding Canadian Jewish Military Museum.

Organizers envision an interactive facility that will showcase military memorabilia, as well as educate about Jewish contributions to Canada's wars, as well as peacekeeping.

To be located somewhere in Toronto or possibly on the planned York Region Jewish community campus, the museum will house artifacts and photographs that have been on display on the fourth floor of the Lipa Green building for the past four years.

Planned for between 8,000 and 10,000 square feet, the museum's main claim to fame, according to promotional material, will be multimedia, interactive exhibits, including a "motion theatre" with activated seating, a 360-degree screen and special effects designed to recreate the feeling of a sea landing, complete with strobe lights, vibrating seats, and the sensation of wind and rain.

Plans also call for oral archives and a memorial Hall of Remembrance.

For details, call 416-781-6344.

George Stern, who was just 17 when he left his native Hungary to fight in the famed Machal, the fledgling State of Israel's irregular army of foreign nations, will lead a 10-day trip to Israel next spring geared especially for former Machalniks and Israeli war veterans.

The trip, from May 8 to 19, 2005, will include touring, a visit to an army base and a trip to the Palmach Museum, which chronicles the pre-state army.

Participants will take part in Yom Ha'atzmaut and Yom Hazikaron ceremonies. Rabbi Wayne Allen of Beth Tikvah Synagogue will accompany the tour.

Waller stepping down as head of Israel Bonds

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Eighteen years ago, Lawrence "Larry" Waller was running a duty free shop in Ben-Gurion Airport in Israel. A native of New York who'd made aliyah, he'd been at the job for 15 years, but was ready for a change.

Fortunately, one of his better customers had connections with the Canadian office of State of Israel Bonds, and suggested Waller as a potential replacement for the departing head of Bonds in Canada.

After a short interview process, Waller agreed to take the job for two or three years, but the time stretched into 18 years.

"One thing led to another," he said.

Waller is stepping down as Bonds' executive vice-president at the end of November. He and his wife, Seza, who served as the Bonds' office manager, are winding up their affairs and preparing to return to Israel, where their five children live.

Although a replacement has not yet been named, Waller has agreed to remain as a consultant to Bonds and shepherd the new executive through a transition period.

Back in the '80s when he "was totally parachuted into this position," he was thrown into the deep end, knowing almost nothing about Toronto and knowing no one in the city.

At the time, Bonds operated "on a shoestring budget" out of cramped quarters in Lawrence Plaza. Sales across Canada totalled only $11 million, he said.

Today, Bonds leases about 4,000 square feet of space in a modern office building a few miles west of its earlier location, and sales have grown substantially, with more than $150 million expected in 2004.

When he took over, Bonds offered two basic financial instruments: a four per cent bond in relatively small denominations and notes that were generally marketed to higher end investors.

A turning point in Bonds sales came when former Israeli finance minister Moshe Nissim (1986-88) visited Canada. Waller accompanied Nissim on a visit to Matthew Barrett, then president of the Bank of Montreal, and "Nissim asked Barrett what the market needed for Israel Bonds to raise its profile and raise money for Israel," Waller recounted.

"That conversation led to a series of new instruments, including a fixed rate bond and a zero coupon Bond" [one that is issued at a discount and matures at par].

The four per cent bond remains, but "today we essentially sell [it] during the High Holiday period," Waller said.

A key selling point for Canadian investors is Israel's perfect record of repayment of principal and interest.

"Despite the political turmoil, [Israel] Bonds has been consistently rated investment grade by Moody's Investors Services and Standard & Poor's, despite all the turmoil we see on CNN," he said.

Israel Bonds' interest rate is higher than those of comparable national bonds "due to the holding period," Waller said. Where Canadian or U.S. bonds are tradeable among investors, Israeli bonds must be held until maturity. To compensate investors for the inability to trade the bonds, Israel offers higher interest, he said.

While Jews remain the largest market for Bonds, about three or four years ago the Bonds office "decided to expand the market in order to be ready for additional Israeli [financial] requirements," Waller said. "We've expanded to private [sector] labour union pension funds, Canadian banks and the latest [buyers] are Christian evangelicals."

The managers of labour pension funds are attracted to the zero coupon Bonds' higher returns and assured payout, and they aren't deterred by the bonds' lack of tradeability, he said. The unions also like the fact the bonds fund developments in Israel that employ unionized labour, he added.

When marketing Israeli bonds, nine months of the year are focused on institutional investors and wealthy individuals who are attracted to the higher returns and the financial benefits of the investments, he said.

For the remaining three months, culminating in the High Holy Days, the focus is on the grassroots of the Jewish community. The sales message takes on an emotional aspect, stressing the infrastructure projects that the bonds finance in Israel.

Looking back on his time in Toronto, Waller said he is most satisfied "by the growth and awareness of the Canadian community at large of the relevance of Israel Bonds to the government of Israel."

Though home to only two per cent of the world Jewish population, Canada accounts for nearly 12 per cent of Bonds' worldwide sales.

Waller believes his success in selling Bonds is "due to the kind of backbone I had which was nurtured in Israel. It gave me the kind of personality that allowed me to pick up the phone on a cold call [or to] ask for assistance."

His love of the country also instilled in him the desire "to work hard for it while I'm abroad. It gave me the backbone not to be shy and it gave me a type A personality."

Living in Israel, "I became pro-active," he said.

That approach, he acknowledged, "does not always work well with the Jewish community. Sometimes, I'm too aggressive, but I learned to temper it after years on the job.

"I hope I did not alienate customers. I don't think sales were lost due to my personality. Maybe I'm wrong."

Holocaust Education Week

Anti-Semitic myths persist, closing program told

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Despite the murder of six million Jews during the Holocaust, three great anti-Semitic myths endure, a former top-level B'nai Brith official declared last week.

Speaking at the closing program of Holocaust Education Week at Beth Tzedec Congregation, William Korey expressed surprise and hurt that these toxic myths continue to exist.

The first myth, expressed in the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a Czarist-era forgery, is that a cabal of wealthy Jews seek to dominate the world.

The second, turning on blood libel, revolves around the notion that Jews kill unwitting Christians to use their blood in the making of Passover matzah.

The third, the oldest, is that Jews killed Jesus.

These myths persist in spite of the fact the United Nations adopted the 1948 Genocide Convention, which mandates member states to act against genocide and anti-Semitism, Korey noted.

Prior to his retirement, he was director of the Anti-Defamation League's regional office in Washington, D.C. and administrator of B'nai Brith's department of international policy and research.

In a despondent observation, he paraphrased Elie Wiesel, the novelist and Holocaust survivor: "If Auschwitz didn't eliminate anti-Semitism, what can and will?"

Striking a similar tone, Korey referred to a recent statement by United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan in which he expressed his incredulity that anti-Semitism flourishes, only 59 years after the gas chambers of Auschwitz were closed.

Korey, who delivered his remarks on on the 66th anniversary of Kristallnacht, said with resignation that the charge of deicide against Jews in the murder of Jesus still lingers, despite efforts by the Vatican to repudiate it.

In his discussion of the anti-Jewish myths that bedevil Jews, Korey dwelled the longest on the Protocols, written more than a century ago by Russian secret service agents and exposed as a forgery by the Times of London in the early 1920s.

Korey said Adolf Hitler read the Protocols with glee and exclaimed, "This is it!"

The Protocols, the Bible of the Nazi movement, poisoned the minds of many young Germans. "One would have thought no one would pay attention to it after World War II," Korey said.

But two years ago, an Egyptian television station ran a serialized drama based on the Protocols, and last year, Malaysia's outgoing prime minister told an international Islamic conference that Jews want to control the world through proxies.

Korey said copies of the Protocols were distributed at the 2001 World Conference on Racism and Xenophobia, sponsored by the United Nations and held in Durban, South Africa.

Taking note of the upsurge of anti-Semitism since the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising in September 2000, Korey said that in that year alone Europe registered 2,116 anti-Jewish incidents.

He chastised French President Jacques Chirac for initially downplaying the seriousness of the situation.

Korey warned that the Holocaust did not begin with gas chambers, but with defamation and the silence of local populations.

Citing a recent survey in which 59 per cent of Europeans branded Israel as the world's greatest threat to peace, Korey said that sustained attacks against Israel amount to "collective anti-Semitism."

In the same vein, Korey castigated the UN's human rights commission for what he said are its constant denunciations of Israel, and for its ineffectiveness in dealing with genocide in the Sudanese province of Darfur.

Korey said that if Jews do not remember the victims of the Holocaust, they run the risk of giving Hitler a posthumous victory.

"We must remember, because if we don't, it can happen again."

Terror and the Defence of the West

Can the West maintain itself as a liberal and democratic society in the face of a new kind of war, one which may require changes to Western society? What is the place of Israel and the Jews in this war against terrorism — separate from the West or part of the defence of the West? What are the roles of Canada and America in this war on terror? How do we understand the new onslaught of Radical Islamic terrorism from a historical perspective? Please join us for the last of four lectures.

Polanski jumped at chance to make The Pianist

By NATALIE RUSKIN
Special to The CJN

Wladyslaw Szpilman died just months before the filming of The Pianist began.

The Pianist recounts the celebrated composer's survival during the Holocaust. In his final days, Szpilman stopped drinking fluids. Memories of his family members having nothing to drink brought on feelings of guilt. That he survived his entire family, unable to help them, was too hard to swallow.

"The older my father got, the more he asked himself why he survived and they didn't," said Andrzej Szpilman, Wladyslaw's son.

He recently spoke to a packed auditorium at Shaar Shalom Synagogue as part of Holocaust Education Week. For nearly two hours, he described the obstacles he faced trying to publish his father's story.

Szpilman's story begins with the discovery of his father's Holocaust memoirs. At the age of 12, he found a hidden copy of his father's journal – and from it learned his father was Jewish. It took 30 years for Szpilman to turn his father's story into an international best-seller.

Shortly after the book's publication, Polish director Roman Polanski transformed the story into the academy award-winning film The Pianist. Having survived the Cracow ghetto, Polanski connected with the story. He signed on to produce the film immediately after receiving the book.

"Polanski gets 3,000 books sent to him a year and, normally it takes him two years to begin once he decides on a book… but with my father's story, Polanski knew right away," Szpilman said.

"Polanski's story is the same… the story of everyone in the ghetto is the same.

"This is not only the story of my father but that of everyone who died in the Holocaust."

One of Szpilman's life-defining moments was in the fourth grade, when he decided to read his father's memoirs to his class. "The teacher told me to read the book to my peers," he said, "but I couldn't read the part showing that I'm a Jew."

Szpilman's mission in life is to have as many people as possible become aware of his father's story and hear his father's music.

Most of the time, his mission has felt like a struggle, he said. Hatred and hostility in 1960s eastern Europe made publication of the book a precarious task. After all, it was Communist Poland, he noted, and "there was no Jewish community."

Szpilman said that "in 1968 many Jews were pressed to leave the country after a big wave of anti-Semitism." But 30 years later, his father's book was published worldwide and it spent two years on Poland's bestseller list.

"When a book is sold 200,000 times in Poland, it means to me that one million people have read the book… it reached a lot of people in Poland," he said.

Exhibit now on at York University

The exhibit, "Rebirth After the Holocaust: The Bergen-Belsen Displaced Persons Camp, 1945-1950," features archival photos and provides vivid accounts of Jewish strife, as well as stories of hope, in the aftermath of one of the world's worst atrocities.

The exhibit is on view at York University until Dec. 3.

"In April 1945, the Nazi concentration camp Bergen-Belsen was liberated by the British army. Virtually overnight, the site was transformed into a temporary 'home' for Jewish displaced persons who then began the process of connecting with surviving family and friends, fought for self-government and began new lives after the Holocaust," says Prof. Martin Lockshin, director of the Centre for Jewish Studies at York.

"If we are to learn from history, education about the Holocaust is crucial," Lockshin says. "Such education can be conducted in many ways. Often it is done by teaching about the horrors of the Holocaust – the unthinkable cruelty, the inhumane behaviour of the perpetrators or the dehumanization of the victims.

Holocaust Education Week

Jews now symbol of Poland's multicultural past

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to the CJN

Despite signs of anti-Semitism, Poland is striving to preserve the memory of its Jewish community and the Holocaust, through memorials, cultural festivals and monuments, says Tomasz Kuncewicz, director of the Auschwitz Jewish Centre in Oswiecim, Poland, and the guest speaker at the recent community commemoration of Kristallnacht at Holy Blossom Temple.

The program, part of Toronto's Holocaust Education Week, commemorated the 66th anniversary of the Night of Broken Glass, a co-ordinated attack on Jews in Germany and Austria on Nov. 9 and 10, 1938.

Speaking on the topic "Preserving Jewish Memory in Poland," Kuncewicz described the efforts of the modern-day Polish community to honour the memory of the Jewish community, which before World War II was considered the "centre of the European Jewish world."

Whereas Warsaw once had the second-biggest Jewish population next to New York City, now the entire country only has an estimated 20,000 Jews, including those unaffiliated with the Jewish community.

Kuncewicz said since 1989 and the development of democracy and capitalism in Poland, the country has experienced an "authentic and growing interest in the pluralist Polish tradition, which allowed many different ethnic groups to reside in Poland."

"The Jews," he continued, "have become the symbol of this multi-cultural past."

People all over Poland are taking care of Jewish sites, often voluntarily. Many Jewish historical buildings are now being renovated and preserved because of Polish state funds and international grants. New Jewish studies departments now exist at universities in cities such as Krakow and Warsaw. And a large Jewish cultural festival in Krakow now attracts thousands of people each year to more than 100 events.

"Thanks to all these initiatives, the memory of former Jewish residents have become an integral part of the local histories. And many remains of Jewish heritage are being saved," said Kuncewicz.

Kuncewicz noted much still needs to be done, as many synagogues and Jewish cemeteries are "shamefully neglected." As well, anti-Semitism is often found in Poland in the form of graffiti, anti-Jewish slogans used at sporting events, and anti-Semitic rhetoric used by radical nationalist political groups.

However, Kuncewicz says memory preservation initiatives, such as the Jewish festival in Krakow, are helping to not only celebrate the past, but create dialogue between present Polish communities.

"The festival is a symbol of Jewish tolerance, pluralism and the faith that we can have a chance, through the celebration of Jewish culture and the celebration of life, to build mutual relations built on truth and respect."

Thanking Kuncewicz, Rabbi Dow Marmur, spiritual leader at Holy Blossom, said, "You have brought to us not only words of comfort, but data and evidence that fills us with hope and inspires us to carry on this kind of creative memory."

The community commemoration of Kristallnacht, which was co-sponsored by Judy and Eric Breuer, also included Hebrew, English and Yiddish music by the Lachan Jewish Chamber Choir of Holy Blossom and a memorial candle- lighting ceremony. Six candles were lit by participants, not only in honour of Jews who died in the Holocaust, but also in honour of survivors, resistance fighters, veterans and allied forces, and righteous gentiles.

'This exhibit teaches about Holocaust in contemporary way'

"This exhibit teaches about the Holocaust in a different and complementary way – by showing the way people rebuilt their lives," he adds. "It is a story of the resilience of human beings, of hope and of courage."

The Germans established Bergen-Belsen near Hanover as a camp for civilian internees during the latter stages of World War II, but the site soon became a full-fledged concentration camp where its inmates suffered unspeakable horrors. With liberation in April 1945, survivors confronted a second, unrestrained wave of catastrophe – during the first month of freedom, 500 persons died daily from starvation, typhus and deprivation. Nevertheless, survivors began to take steps to restore their lives.

"Rebirth After the Holocaust" will be shown at The Samuel J. Zacks Gallery, Room 109 of Stong College at York University, 4700 Keele St. A campus map can be found at www.yorku.ca/web/future students/map/

The exhibit is presented by York University's Centre for Jewish Studies and the Holocaust Centre of Toronto as part of the 24th Annual Holocaust Education Week of the UJA of Greater Toronto.

What the Dead Sea Scrolls Tell Us About Ourselves

As the greatest archaeological discovery of modern times, the Dead Sea Scrolls have taught us a great deal about a peculiar group of Jews who lived on the shores of the Dead Sea 2,000 years ago. What we are only beginning to realize is what these ancient texts can tell us about Judaism today, where it comes from, and where it may be headed.

Safdie encourages interpretation of his designs

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Architect Moshe Safdie encourages people to interpret his projects themselves.

"I don't make a big thing out of metaphors. People's feelings are intensely private; they should make their own associations," says Safdie, designer of the new Holocaust Museum at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem, set to open in March.

Safdie, born in Haifa in 1938, heads the Boston-based Moshe Safdie and Associates, an architecture and design firm that has branch offices in Toronto and Jerusalem.

The architect behind Habitat 67, the experimental housing project for Montreal's Expo 67, has also designed a variety of other significant projects, including the National Gallery of Canada in Ottawa and the Children's Holocaust Memorial within Yad Vashem.

He was here recently as the keynote speaker at the Yad Vashem 2004 Gala Dinner.

Speaking by telephone from his office in Boston prior to the dinner, Safdie said he hears many different interpretations of his Yad Vashem project.

"The reception area of the museum is built like a sukkah with a roof of glass and trellis. When the light comes into the room, it is striped by the roof, and many people have said that that is a metaphor for the striped uniforms worn by Jews in the concentration camps.

"It may be that I planned that unconsciously, but [people feel things in many ways]."

Plans for the new museum have been in the works for 10 years – Safdie has worked on it for eight – and involved completely redoing the campus, and tripling its size, he says.

"We've preserved certain parts, but we've reshaped the entire place."

One of the biggest challenges in designing the project – apart from the "emotionally charged" challenge of dealing with such a sensitive issue – was maintaining the character of the surrounding natural landscape, he says. "I think of the Mount of Memory as being on sacred ground, and when they talked about a major new museum, I was reluctant to [create] something that would dominate the hill.

"I felt it was appropriate to build underground, but not have it totally [submerged]."

The end result was a triangular-shaped structure that disappears underground with the uppermost ridge protruding through the mountain.

Visitors enter through the reception area and go on to the museum by crossing a bridge from the Avenue of the Righteous Among the Nations. Once inside they are guided through underground galleries that depict different aspects of the Holocaust.

"We chose a triangular form so we could support the pressure of the earth above the prism while bringing in daylight. The skylight allows gleams of daylight to contrast with darker areas.

"Cutting through the mountain makes visitors feel as if they are entering through darkness, and emerging into daylight."

The Children's Museum contains a room lined with mirrors, and a triangular shaft that holds four burning candles. "The effect is of a million flames floating in space to symbolize the number of children killed in the Holocaust."

He first designed the Children's Museum in 1976 in Montreal, he says, but it was rejected by the Yad Vashem board and its directors. "They felt that it was a place that people must look at objectively, and that my design was too abstract. They were resistant to my idea.

"It was a decade later that a donor saw the proposal and helped get it built.

"[This current project] was not handed to me on a silver plate. I was pleased and awed to be given the opportunity to work on something of that significance.

"I have designed libraries, airports, etc., and all my works are significant, but the Holocaust is a formidable event in history. In that sense my work occupied me in a different way."

It was not necessary to have a Jew design the project, he says. "It has to do with spirituality and that is not exclusive to Jews. It is good for Yad Vashem, however, that it was designed by a Jew and an Israeli."

Carman's cut above

Dining Out

■ By Sara Waxman

VENTURING INTO the unknown and searching out hot new restaurants should, I believe, be tempered by taking a sentimental journey to a hot old restaurant. One such eatery that has survived the test of time for 45 years is Carman's.

It has survived the slings and arrows of critics; the vicissitudes of recessions and inflations, the vagaries of fashion and food trends; the pronouncements of the LLBO; the drama of temperamental chefs and waiters; the necessity to ever increase the size of the bill, and all those ephemeral peccadilloes that make owning a restaurant a mighty risky business.

Recently, at a glitzy Fashion Week reception, I mentioned that I was on my way to have dinner at Carman's. The reaction was staggering.

"I love Carman's," enthused several women who look as if they live on water and lettuce and an occasional popsicle. "But I haven't been there for ages."

Now seated at a banquette surrounded by the rich patina of polished wood, brass and pewter in Arthur Carman's 45-year-old restaurant, it is clear that women are not among the regular habitues in this room. In fact, I am a visible minority — the only woman in a room full of men.

Ah, but is there anything more delicious and sensually satisfying than the basic meat and potatoes we consider to be "man food."

Besides the standard a la carte steakhouse menu of barbecued ribs, shrimp, lobster and veal chops, there are two fixed price recommendations: Complete steak dinners that offer either filet mignon ($104) or rib steak ($98) for two.

Are they kidding? This is the approximate cost of dinner for one at most other local cow palaces. Bring it on! Medium rare, please.

Carman's Club
26 Alexander St.,
416-924-8558
■ Appetizers:
$6.50-$12.95
■ Main Course:
$40-$48

Here, they leave nothing to the imagination. Carman's follows tradition and gives you "the works" just as they did in the '50s.

First, a basket of thickly cut toasted garlic bread with the nubbins of garlic crusty brown from the oven. I have to sit on my hands to prevent myself from going through the entire basket.

And there is a bowl of large old-fashioned dills and small dangerously hot peppers. Actually, it's the seeds that are hot. Still, you don't want to pick up one of these little devils and then rub your eyes.

Wine-soaked olives, a bowl of cottage cheese, the significance of which I never understood, a dish of garlic-laced tzatziki (because Carman is Greek), and a choice of Caesar, Greek or green salad with balsamic dressing round out the fine beginning.

We can hear the sizzle as our rib steaks on their wooden steak boards are set before us. Crusty brown, snatched from the grill at the exact second of their doneness, aromatic with that inimitable garlicky seasoning that made Carman famous.

"Please," says our waiter, shining a small flashlight on the steak.

"Cut into it and see if it is done to your liking."

We like it. We like it.

And there is a beautiful baked potato, not the firm-fleshed Yukon Golds that I prefer, but a thing of beauty nonetheless, and an array of condiments: Chopped chives, bacon, sour cream and butter.

Not enough for my over-reaching pal who asks for Bearnaise sauce.

"We don't serve that," says our waiter with a hurt look in his eye. "Is the steak not tasty enough?"

It is more than tasty, it satisfies every corner of our meat-eating soul.

And it is simply in the interests of research that I force myself to eat every crumb of the moist aned lusciously frosted carrot cake and drink several cups of coffee.

It's an offer I can't refuse — it's all part of the $98 fixed-price menu.

I REMEMBER

by Donia B. Clenman

I was a princess in my father's garden where candy-coloured nasturtiums overflowed the border and mauve maciejka's fragrance won over haughty jasmine.
And it vanished
and is no more.

I sailed through seas of honey wheat at harvest and it bowed to me
while I picked cornflowers and crimson poppies.
And they withered
and are no more.

I waded in silvery brooks winding symphonies of unknown and dreamt bold dreams of childhood's odysseys and the forget-me-nots whispered.
And they are silent and here no more.

I picked moist, sweet berries and my blackened teeth in unselfconscious smiles dripped juices on my reddened lips and the echo was alive with laughter.
And it froze
and is no more.

But most of all I remember my grandfather's patriarchal beard and his mighty chee-ree-bim-boms;
the musty Polish synagogue
where penguin-like Hassidim would drop their puritan plumage and obey the call of love to sway with wild abandon,
kissing the sacred pages,
their dance quickening to match blood's ardour,
the rising voice weaving wordless melodies
Song of Songs to His Beloved.

It was so long ago
and our graves are unmarked.
I waved good-by to the belching smoke,
the bleeding sun, the bloodless moon,
but childhood I remember.

Donia B. Clenman received honourable mention for this poem in the Miriam Lindberg Israel Poetry for Peace contest.

Why do we use our resources for war?

Books
Bernard Baskin

War: The New Edition*, by Gwynne Dyer, Random House.

Organized warfare has been our constant companion through the centuries. More and more, it seems like an incurable disease. In its wake, almost everyone becomes affected. In the wars of the 20th century, no fewer then 62 million civilians have perished, 20 million more then the 43 million actually killed in battle.

The problem extends far beyond politics: it is the central moral problem of humanity, of survival itself. Are we to perish entirely, because we mobilized our vast resources for annihilation and not for creation? Is it the final irony of the human race that we deliberately use our wealth and skill and intelligence for mutual destruction?

Why should so much of our intelligence and cunning and resources go toward creating a war apparatus, and so little toward the common problems that face the human race: food and shelter, disease, population explosions and economic justice?

Gwynne Dyer, in this updated edition of a classic work, argues that violence, contention and strife seem to be part of our biological inheritance. The shift, long ago, from hunting and gathering to agricultural societies, stimulated truculence and warlike tendencies among human beings that still remain with us.

In our time, the escalation of war has led to the invention of nuclear weapons with almost unimaginable destructive power. Unfortunately, Dyer observes, "Weapons created are eventually used. The major nations have gone to war about every 50 years throughout modern history. Big war is not over. It is just on holiday."

Despite the author's claim that we have a genetic predisposition for violence, he is sure that it does not have to be our certain future. It can be overcome. He looks reality in the face but does not despair.

He maintains that it would be easy to catalogue the many failures of the United Nations, but it would also be misleading. It was bound to be a relative failure at the outset, and that is no reason to despair, he says. It was always going to be hard to persuade sovereign governments whose institutions have served them and their predecessors well for 10,000 years to surrender power to an untried world authority that might then make decisions that were against their particular interests.

> The United Nations as currently constituted seems unable and unlikely to deal effectively with problems affecting war and peace

"Progress will necessarily be measured in small stops even over a period of decades," he writes.

Unfortunately, the United Nations as currently constituted seems unable and unlikely to deal effectively with problems affecting war and peace between major nations or even eliminating violence among smaller ones.

The author, a well-known journalist and military analyst, deals with warfare in its many guises through the ages – from the walls of Jericho to the car bombs of Baghdad, from primitive weapons to our thermonuclear and terrorism-haunted present.

A final and inevitable question: how can we invent such magnificent machines, devise such brilliant technical systems, co-operate in such scientific ventures – and yet fail to use any of our God-given reason to construct a world wonder that is sane, just and truly civilized? Our means are miracles of ingenuity, and our ends are barbarous remnants of prehistoric times. We are living in the most crashing paradox of history – and it may be the last one.

This sane, informative and lucid history is unhappily of no great help in confronting this paramount problem.

Jewish Life

Jewish comics, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Matzoh Girl, Shaloman and Masada. They may not be quite as famous a Supergirl, Batman or Captain America, but they do have something special going for them – they're Jewish superheroes.

Last week, I told you about some of the Jewish artists, writers and publishers who have been instrumental in creating North America's comic book culture. Although you can try to decode Jewish characteristics from legends such as Spider-Man and Superman, neither of them is Jewish. But that doesn't mean the comic book world is bereft of Jewish heroes.

Jewish superhero Shaloman is also known as "The Man of Stone." When the call of "oi-vay" is uttered, Shaloman appears atop Mount Israel, morphing from a stone carving into a flesh-and-blood superhero. [http://tinyurl.com/5gnyt]

Masada (aka Deborah Konigsberg) is an Israeli super-woman who can grow to gigantic height with matching strength. [www.internationalhero.co.uk/m/masada.htm]

Matzoh Girl is one of the few Canadian-Jewish superheroines – and the first superheroine with matzoh powers. [http://tinyurl.com/6fyvl]

Granted, these three are not household names. But Jewish characters are no longer a rarity in mainstream comics published by industry leaders Marvel and DC. An amazing web page titled "Jewish Comics Exhibit Notes" has full-colour reproductions of the covers of more than three dozen comics with Jewish heroes or themes. A sampling:

"The Doom Patrol teams up with Reb Chaim to stop Joseph Della Reina's attempt to force the Messiah to come prematurely."

"Green Arrow teams up with agents of the Mossad to fight terrorists who are trying to poison the local water supply with radioactive material."

"Superman, thrown into the past, helps save Jews in the Warsaw Ghetto in the 1940s." [http://tinyurl.com/6fyvl]

Israel has had its own cadre of comic book characters who can rival any superhero on this side of the Atlantic (well, maybe.) Take for example Sabraman, The Golem and the inimitable Super-Shlumper. While Israel doesn't have a long history of domestic superheroes, Eli Eshed writes that from 1930 to 1970, there were a thousand Israeli stories about Tarzan, Man of the Jungle. The first Israeli superheroes showed up in the '50s, but they seemed just as preoccupied with fighting evil as with promoting good eating habits.

Gidi Gezer (Gidi Carrot) "was an Israeli youth at the time of the War of Independence who had super powers as a result of eating carrots, and with these powers he battled the British and the Arabs." Another superhero who appeared in the 1960s was "Yoav Ben Halav" (Yoav Son of Milk). [http://tinyurl.com/64knl]

In the Jewish world of comics, one character seems to have more popularity and lives than any other – the Golem. Rabbi Judah Loew ben Bezalel, the Maharal of Prague in the 16th century, is said to have created an artificial creature out of clay to protect the Jews of his city from a blood libel. [http://tinyurl.com/5f9gt] Modern cartoonists have mined the Golem legend and continued to reincarnate him. In "Mendy and the Golem," a magically animated humanoid clay statue obeys only Mendy, a normal human boy. [www.thegolem.com/]

In the 70s, "The Golem, the Thing that Walks Like a Man!" received top billing for a few issues at Marvel Comics. [http://tinyurl.com/456p2] And just last year, another Golem was reborn in its mind-bending Hebrew-language comic. This muscular, faceless Golem lives in an alternate universe and has been around during pivotal moments in Israeli history and collaborated with real-life personalities. [http://tinyurl.com/6ckx4]

For all their advances, there still isn't an openly Jewish character with his or her own continuing title at the major publishers. Fans of a superhero named Sabra hope to change all that. Decked out in a blue and white costume with a large Star of David on her chest, Sabra (aka Ruth Bat-Seraph) has appeared as a supporting character in Marvel Comics. [http://asifa.net/israel/sabra.html]

Fans of Sabra have created an online petition urging Marvel to give her a series of her own. [www.petitiononline.com/123A/petition.html]

The rungs on Jacob's Ladder

By RABBI YECHIEL GOLDREICH

Jacob dreamt of a ladder connecting earth to sky, with angels ascending and descending. Our sages tell us this was the first sleep he experienced after many years of Torah study. He dreamt of Torah's true nature, of angels climbing and falling, of so many rungs, of so many shades of grey – nuances and questions on the ladder that takes us from our earthly existence up to heaven.

Our sages tell us that salvation comes through Torah study, that Torah study is the way we improve ourselves and advance the cause of tikkun olam, making the world a better place. By delving into the subtleties of a moral dilemma, we sensitize ourselves to act in a manner that is more thoughtful, decent, and holy.

The parshah does not end with the ladder dream. Torah dilemmas were never meant to be strictly academic. Jacob travels to the house of Lavan, where God requires he and his family to live and interact with questions of morality.

Should he rebuke workers who are slacking off, or does he mind his own business? Should a person help their sister at the expense of a husband? Should you stay with an unloved spouse to spare her feelings? Can you steal from your boss (who is a gonnif) merely to get back what is rightfully yours? Can you steal from addicts to stop them from harming themselves? When do the ends justify the means?

These were the moral dilemmas Jacob had to confront. These are the major questions of our Torah portion. On these issues, Jacob's angels would ascend or fall while trying to reach heaven.

Similarly, the nation of Israel consistently finds itself on the front covers of newspapers around the world. The news stories often focus on moral dilemmas that are Torah-like in their weightiness. Do we extend democratic rights to people committed to our destruction? Should a soldier refuse an order he believes to be immoral? Do we compromise our nationalism for the sake of pragmatism? Should we shoot at terrorists if we know innocent people will also be harmed?

These are the moral dilemmas Israel has to live with. These are the major questions of our Torah portion. On these questions, our angels ascend or, God forbid, fall while trying to reach heaven.

May we merit correct understanding in our Torah studies and the strength to see our studies into proper action.

Rabbi Goldreich is assistant rabbi at Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

'Cutting edge' think tank held on intermarriage

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

How does a community or synagogue maintain its sense of distinctiveness, and at the same time open the door to people in interfaith marriages, in a way that is welcoming and not just grudging?

How does one teach about the importance of inmarriage, and still maintain an openness to those who have married out?

Those were some of the questions on the mind of Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, senior rabbi of Beth Tzedec Congregation, when he returned from an invitation-only think tank on intermarriage last month. The meeting, the third in a series run by the Conservative movement's Federation of Jewish Men's Clubs (FJMC), was held in Hollywood Beach, Fla.

Rabbi Wayne Allen of Beth Tikvah Congregation is the only other Canadian to have participated thus far. Last December, he travelled to Los Angeles for the first such event, where he shared his synagogue's experience with the issue.

For more than two years, Beth Tikvah has run a program for members and non-members, called "Married Out, Not Opted Out." Most participants have children who are intermarried or interdating. Interfaith couples make up a small proportion, the rabbi said.

The underlying premise is that "Jews who intermarry are not making a declaration of secession from Judaism or the community," said Rabbi Allen, who does individual counselling and has also spoken to the group. "We did not want to lose them. Every Jew is precious, and in our day when assimilation is a very severe threat, we wanted to hold on to any Jews who wanted to retain their affiliation."

Rabbi Allen attributes the relative rarity of such groups to many reasons, including the delicate nature of the subject and competition for limited resources.

Married Out, Not Opted Out began in the context of "exploratory work" with no budget, he said. It has since become an established program with a social worker facilitating the group.

If other synagogues don't have similar programs, "it's not because they're being lackadaisical," he said. "It's because it's a pioneering initiative."

Both rabbis said their synagogues have a small percentage of interfaith couples. At Beth Tikvah, programming rose from a grass roots movement; at Beth Tzedec, there has not yet been a demand for such a program, although there was a series a few years ago in conjunction with Jewish Family & Child Service, said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl.

He is "certainly aware, as we all are, of increased rates of intermarriage... I'm anticipating [that in the future] the issues are going to arise more and more."

Based on American statistics, he noted that in a marriage between a Jewish man and a non-Jewish woman, "the likelihood of there being a significant Jewish attachment on the part of the child to the Jewish community is very slim."

Speaking for the majority of Conservative leaders, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said, "We don't want to go in the direction of the [more liberal] Reform movement, either in terms of patrilineality [accepting a child as Jewish on the basis of the father's Jewishness, instead of using the halachic criterion of the mother's Jewishness] or in terms of opening our congregations up to looking at non-Jews as members.

"We also don't want to go the other way, to exclude people from our congregations who are intermarried. We want to find a way within a framework that promotes inmarriage and that understands the borders of Jewish law, and still be a welcoming community."

Personal contact between rabbis and congregants "to let them know that they're still valued and that there's still a place for them" is one part of addressing the issue, he said.

Relevant programming might include teaching grandparents "how to be conveyors of Jewish tradition," or programming for couples regarding issues that arise in the marriage.

At Beth Tzedec, non-Jewish family members cannot be members of the congregation, but are welcome at all programs and services (tickets are provided for the High Holy Days).

Similarly at Beth Tikvah, non-Jewish spouses of members are entitled to High Holy Day seats. "We've made a conscious choice. We're not going to separate the families... Everyone is welcome," said Rabbi Allen.

Arafat 'incapable of putting Palestinian state on the map'

Canadian Jewish Congress president Ed Morgan remarked that while Arafat "put the cause of the Palestinian people on the map of political causes, he was incapable of putting a Palestinian state on the map of states."

Congress said it hopes that the new Palestinian leadership will reject violence "and be imbued with the necessary courage to pursue the 'peace of the brave'" – using Arafat's own oft-quoted phrase to describe the aftermath of the 1993 Oslo accords.

Similar sentiments were sounded by the Canada-Israel Committee, which issued a one-sentence statement: "The Canada-Israel Committee expresses the hope that a new leadership will quickly emerge from within Palestinian society, committed to democratic reform and genuinely partnering with Israel to advance peace for Israelis and Palestinians alike."

B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) called Arafat "an unreformed terrorist until the very end."

B'nai Brith also found it "offensive" that Canada sent Foreign Affairs Minister Pierre Pettigrew to Arafat's funeral.

The decision "is an insult to the memory of all those whose blood Arafat has on his hands."

B'nai Brith said Martin's statement eulogized Arafat "as deserving of his Nobel Peace Prize… [while] ignoring Arafat's complicity in allowing terror groups under his control to act with impunity." That "sends precisely the wrong message of appeasement," B'nai Brith said.

In an earlier statement, B'nai Brith predicted that Arafat's death "will clearly precipitate great upheaval in the region."

But Rose Lax, president of Herut-Likud Canada, sees a window of opportunity, calling Arafat's death "the single most constructive development toward peace in the Middle East."

The new Palestinian leadership, Lax said, "now has a unique opportunity to address the corruption and misrepresentation that has victimized the Palestinian people until now."

In a more detailed statement, Canadian Friends of Peace Now said the prospect of a "more moderate" Palestinian leadership under prime minister Ahmed Queria and Mahmoud Abbas, the newly named chairman of the Palestine Liberation Organization, should encourage Israel and the U.S. leaders to renew the peace process "and seek negotiated rather than unilateral solutions to the Israeli occupation of the Palestinian territories."

Av Sohn, president of the Friends, said it would be "a tragic mistake if [Israeli prime minister Ariel] Sharon were once again to undermine Palestinian moderates, as he did when Abbas was previously prime minister, by refusing to take conciliatory actions (such as easing conditions of movement within the occupied territories) that might have helped him then, and might help him now, to consolidate his position."

The Palestinian leadership will need time to gain legitimacy, but will not be able to do so "if it is subject to an Israeli dictate for immediate suppression of terrorism," Peace Now went on. "The initial confidence-building measures will have to come from Israel, to be reciprocated by the Palestinian leadership as it wins credibility among its own people."

For many in Canada's Jewish community, it may have been the statement from a small, little-known grassroots activist group, the Canadian Coalition for Democracies, that best summed up sentiments in the wake of Arafat's death.

The Palestinian leader, said the group, which has a good number of Jewish representatives, was "given the opportunity to die of old age and disease – a privilege he denied to thousands of innocents whose lives were ended or shattered by his endless promotion of hate and terrorism."

To honour Arafat in death, the group continued, would be to dishonor the thousands "whose lives were destroyed by this man's incitement. Canada must not be party to such a dishonour."

The group also took Canada to task for contributing to the suffering in the Middle East "by lending credibility to Arafat and his toxic mythology."

In the United States, Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, and a frequent speaker in Canada, said Arafat will be remembered as "the largest mass murderer of Jews since Hitler," and as someone "more devoted to killing Jews than to the welfare of his own people.'"

Arafat visited Canada once, in March 1999. It was a one-day trip, part of a whirlwind tour of eight nations designed to drum up western support for his unilateral declaration of independence, which he'd threatened for May 4 of that year. He failed to get Canada's support.

In Ottawa, he held talks with then prime minister Jean Chrétien for 40 minutes, after which Chrétien reaffirmed Canada's support for the idea of a Palestinian state, stressing, though, that it should be achieved through negotiations and not a unilateral declaration.

However, the prime minister did get caught up in controversy typical of the Middle East minefield when he said negotiations "should result [in] the creation of a state for the Palestinians."

Canada's Jewish advocacy groups demanded an explanation, charging that his statement pre-judged the outcome of bilateral talks and represented a departure from long-held Canadian policy.

Arafat and Chrétien met again in 2000 during the prime minister's historic trip to Israel and the Palestinian territories, and again Chrétien stumbled.

He was criticized for advising Arafat that a unilateral declaration of independence could be a useful bargaining tool – contradicting his earlier view, irking Israel, and handing ammunition to Quebec separatists.

Toronto mayor visits Earl Bales open house

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Mayor David Miller was warmly greeted at an Earl Bales Community Centre open house earlier this month as part of a city-wide day called "Celebrate Our Common Grounds."

During the Nov. 7 event – organized by volunteers and City of Toronto parks and recreation staff to highlight the department's services and facilities – Miller visited with hundreds of residents and volunteers at four city parks and community centres.

At Earl Bales, he mixed with several hundred people of all ages, and he stopped at booths and displays to talk with city residents about activities at the centre.

The Toronto Accolades of Harmony Incorporated, a barbershop chorus of 29 Toronto-area women, entertained the mayor and other guests. The chorus, directed by Wendy Shibata, rehearses at Earl Bales every Thursday evening.

At a short ceremony, Brenda Librecz, acting general manager of parks and recreation, described Toronto as a city within a park.

"But parks and recreation is about more than parks, facilities and programs, it's about people – volunteers, residents, stakeholders, participants and staff – and the wonderful things that happen when we all come together," she said.

Miller thanked the volunteers for making Earl Bales Community Centre "a very special place, much beyond the building."

Councillor Michael Feldman spoke about the mayor's dedication to the community in giving up a Sunday with his wife and two children to see "what is going on in his city."

He and Miller both emphasized the importance of volunteers and of telling politicians from all levels of government what citizens want.

Walking among the displays, the mayor stopped to speak with members of Earl Bales' Seniors Woodworking Club.

Len Franklin, a club member who was displaying some of his work, said some 30 people are regulars in the woodworking shop, which is open daily from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m.

"Men and women help each other," Franklin said. "Everybody is in charge of everything – it's a real Jewish organization," he joked.

The workshop is open to the community and the fee is $40 a year, or about 10 cents a day, he said.

Norm Grosbein displayed some of his abstract wood creations that he makes from scraps of wood, while Saul Marjasz talked about working with veneers. Well-known violin maker and woodcarver Lewis Cohen also exhibited some of his pieces.

To receive a publication that lists programs in 33 city-run facilities in the parks and recreation department's northern district, call 416-338-4FUN (4386), or visit www.city.toronto.on.ca/parks

For information on activities at Earl Bales Community Centre, call Brian Waterman at 416-395-6022.

B'nai Brith Canada campus allegations denied

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A Montreal Gazette article that indicated B'nai Brith Canada's human rights complaint about Concordia University is only the start of a nationwide campaign has created a stir at other universities that the advocacy group said have failed to protect Jewish students against discrimination.

The Nov. 5 article said that B'nai Brith, which filed its complaint with the Quebec Human Rights Commission, was looking at pursuing similar actions against York University and Ryerson University in Toronto, McMaster University in Hamilton, and the University of Western Ontario in London.

Ryerson was quick to issue a news release expressing shock at its inclusion on the list and citing "excellent relations" with Jewish students. "B'nai Brith has made no attempt to contact Ryerson about its alleged complaints," the release said.

"We take issues of harassment and discrimination extremely seriously," university president Claude Lajeunesse said. "We work extremely hard and proactively to ensure a welcoming campus environment for everyone and we have an excellent partnership with our student groups."

Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith's national executive vice-president, said that action against Concordia is part of a campaign to "vigorously monitor the situation on campuses nationwide, and take action if and when we deem necessary."

B'nai Brith is "exploring… all options," he said, referring to "future human rights complaint[s], or lawsuit[s], or working with a university administration.

"Concordia is not an isolated example of Jewish discrimination, but part of what we believe to be a much wider trend in academia where Jewish students fear that they cannot freely voice their opinions on Israel or the Middle East without this resulting in harassment or seeing their marks suffer."

Zac Kaye, executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto, said that "most universities have become very sensitive to these issues and have worked very hard to set up a culture on campus that really speaks to all students."

At Ryerson specifically, those efforts have "enabled a calmer environment to prevail," he said.

Similarly at York, "I think we have a very different environment on campus than we did last year."

Kaye stressed that there are complaints procedures at the universities themselves. Hillel staff can and have interceded on behalf of students with administrators when students did not choose to approach them directly, he said.

In London, Jared Isaacson, the executive director of London Jewish Campus Services, said he was "incredibly surprised and concerned" to receive the Gazette article in an e-mail.

Isaacson admitted that issues do come up on campus, but he did not think there was a basis in fact to proceed with a human rights complaint.

"Many Jewish students know to approach the Hillel office" when there is a problem involving professors or other students, he said.

B'nai Brith did not consult with Hillel, nor does the organization agree that Jewish students feel threatened, insecure or in danger, Isaacson added.

B'nai Brith would not release specifics of any complaints, because of confidentiality promised to students and others who contact its anti-hate hotline.

Speaking out against genocide

By SHERI SHEFA
Special to The CJN

In a speech received by a standing ovation and that even moved one student to tears, Stephen Lewis recently urged Canadians to speak out, to protest, and to advocate against the genocide in Darfur.

"What has happened in the past several months in Sudan is almost beyond the capacity of the human psyche to absorb," said Lewis, the United Nations secretary general's special envoy for HIV/AIDS in Africa, at the University of Toronto's OISE auditorium.

According to a UN report, 70,000 people have died in refugee camps in western Darfur since March. With 1.6 million people living in camps, thousands more are dying each day from malnutrition and unlivable conditions.

Lewis blames these crimes against humanity on the pro-government Arab militia attempting to exert control over a country divided by religious and ethnic backgrounds. "The killing, the maiming, and the raping are now almost legendary," he says.

The conflict over land between African farmers and Arabic nomads began in early 2003, and has escalated into a violent war between African guerrilla groups and the Arab militia called Janjaweed.

This is not the first time a systematic ethnic cleansing has taken place without reaction from the western world. "My mind goes racing back to when 800,000 people were slaughtered in Rwanda," recalls Lewis, "in the full view of the world, and the world raised not a finger."

This event, put together by Hillel at U of T as part of Holocaust Education week, was meant to inform as well as evoke action. Avrum Rosensweig, executive director of Ve'ahavta, made an impassioned plea for people to stand up and exercise their voices.

"We can no longer sit by and say we don't know what's happening. There should not be a feeling of guilt in this room. There should be a feeling of empowerment. We are the government."

Johanna Herman, the president of Hillel at U of T, feels this is an issue that should strike a chord with Jews who were victims of genocide during World War II. "We learned a very hard lesson through the Holocaust and I think to sit by while another genocide is happening is not an option for Jewish people."

But the reality, said Lewis, is that countries like Canada, that have the means to evoke change, are simply refusing to intervene. "I find it very difficult personally to understand how the world can stand back from all the horrors and continue to watch with impunity...It is simply the reality that 'never again' means again and again."

Obituary

Steinman was Ottawa's 'Yiddishe Mama'

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

Thelma Steinman

OTTAWA — Ottawa's "Yiddishe Mama," Thelma Steinman, died Nov. 7, at the age of 92.

Though diminutive in stature, Steinman was a quiet but powerful force in the Ottawa Jewish community.

She had friends of all ages and was known far and wide as a true lady, a friend to everyone who was fortunate enough to cross her path.

Those friends were legion, as she was active in almost every facet of the community.

Steinman could have written a book about lashon hara, something that she never practised, said Rabbi Reuven Bulka at Steinman's funeral.

Not only did she never utter a bad word about anyone, she always took the time to call and even write a personal note to congratulate people on their achievements, no matter how seemingly small or insignificant, he said. "She was a one-person cheering section."

Born in Mankiefka, Kiev, the former Tanya Riber moved to Ottawa with her family where she met and married her late husband, Nathan. Together they operated a store in Ottawa's Byward Market.

Her incredible zest for life and interest in everything and everybody led Steinman to participate in a vast array of activities in addition to her volunteer work.

While many seniors are reluctant to go out after dark, Steinman would attend many social, cultural or educational events in the Jewish community, always smiling and enjoying herself.

When she was over 90, she was featured on local television for her dedication to her regular workouts at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre gym. From there she would usually walk across the parking lot to visit "the elderly" at Hillel Lodge.

Many of the organizations and facilities in the community benefited from her tireless efforts at fundraising and committee work. Both before and after the death of her husband, Steinman spent countless hours working for the causes she believed in.

"My mother-in-law was an outstanding and great Jewish woman who lived a full and complete Jewish life, and engaged in a Jewish odyssey," said son-in-law Stephen Victor.

"She contributed greatly to the establishment and continuation of all of the major institutions in our community, including the Jewish day school [Hillel Academy], Hillel Lodge [seniors' facility], Jewish Family Services and the Soloway Jewish Community Centre.

"She was loved and respected by all those whose lives she touched and she touched many, many lives. She was an inspiration and a mentor to all generations of Jews in our city."

Steinman is survived by her daughters and sons-in-law Elaine and Dan Shapiro, Gail and Stephen Victor, and Adele Tate, six grandchildren and three great-grandchildren, as well as two sisters and two sisters-in-law.

Resisting the urge to lionize Arafat

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In the extended period leading up to the announcement of Yasser Arafat's death late on Nov. 10, most major media were united in their appraisal of the man and his legacy. The usual tendency to romanticize a leader on his deathbed was in this case avoided.

The Nov. 6 New York Times editorial "The Man Who Refused to Say Yes" was titled after what the Times said was Arafat's worst diplomatic decision: "It is almost unbearably disappointing that four years ago, faced with the admittedly difficult choice of saying yes to Israel [at Camp David and in the following months], Mr. Arafat said no."

While acknowledging that Arafat was a unifying symbol for his people, the Times faulted the Palestinian Authority president for massively failing the test of leadership, saying he did not prepare the Palestinians for "the pragmatic direction" they had to move in if they were to be truly committed to a two-state solution to the conflict with Israel.

The Times wrote: "Worse, [Arafat] made no serious attempt to build a competent government below him or to prepare his people for the required compromises of a peace deal or the responsibilities of statehood."

New York Times columnist Thomas Friedman ("Footprints in the Sand," Nov. 7) related his unsuccessful Internet search for articles in which Arafat prepared the Palestinians for a peaceful transition to statehood.

Friedman wrote: "I couldn't come up with a single speech, or even full paragraph, in which Arafat laid out his vision for how Palestinians would educate their youth and nurture their talents. Maybe all his speeches on that subject were never translated from Arabic. Or maybe they just don't exist – because this was never his priority."

In the Nov. 8 editorial "Life without Arafat," the National Post wrote that Arafat displayed a "genius" for capturing the minds of "Arabs and Western leftists alike… he knew how to package his people's cause in a way that would resonate among First World intellectuals."

But beyond the propaganda, Arafat's negative record could not be ignored. Even the liberal Toronto Star, in its editorial "Arafat embodied a people's hope" (Nov. 10), took a position (headline aside) that was quite close to the ones expressed by the Times and the Post. While acknowledging that Arafat "has been the icon of the Palestinian identity," the paper faulted him for passing up the historic opportunity to bring statehood to his people at Camp David, and in general for being a "serial strategic blunderer," unable to make the transition from militant leader to a statesman. Looking forward, the Star called for "someone more decisive, more forward-looking and more open to compromise."

The Post also noted: "In flagrant contradiction of the Oslo accords, [Arafat] used his schools and mosques to incite a systematic campaign of hatred against Jews… The promise of democracy evaporated: Arafat became a corrupt Arab dictator like all the others who had sold the Palestinians out, buying off local warlords with aid money that came pouring in from abroad."

These assessments call to mind what National Post columnist Robert Fulford once wrote when he distilled volumes into two precisely chosen words, depicting Arafat as a "sacred monster."

In principle, Arafat's passing will free the Palestinians to find a leader or leadership capable of acting in their best interests, and to work responsibly toward a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Unfortunately, as many analysts have noted, there is currently no leader with a large enough following to fit the bill.

In the meantime, some pundits are already beginning to turn their sights on Israel, predicting that pressure will fall increasingly on Prime Minister Ariel Sharon now that a recalcitrant Arafat is no longer on the scene. More about that next week.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Child sensation shines at shul's birthday bash

By BOB DALE
Special to The CJN

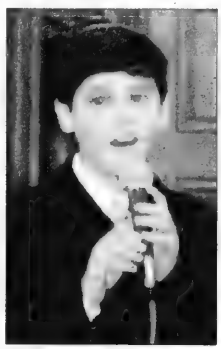
OTTAWA — When Jakie Young walked on stage at Ottawa's Congregation Beth Shalom West, he looked like any other 12-year-old, except that boys his age don't usually wear tuxedoes.

But when the diminutive performer kicked off the concert to mark the shul's 25th anniversary, everyone at the Oct. 24 event realized that Jakie's no ordinary 12-year-old. The sounds that came out of his mouth as he sang his opening number, Hamelech Hagoel, were extraordinary.

When he followed up with a heart-rending rendition of the old Yiddish favourite Rozinkes mit Mandlen, and then a rousing version of Circle of Life, the crowd learned what many Torontonians have known for several years: Jakie Young, with his his trained soprano voice, is a musical prodigy.

He regularly accompanies his father, Cantor David Young of Beth Torah Congregation in Toronto, as junior cantor, and he has performed at major events in the city, including the Lodzer Centre Congregation's 50th anniversary gala and the world premier of Ruth Fazal's Oratio Terezin at the George Weston Recital Hall.

Jakie's musical ability was evident from age two, when he started singing. He had perfect pitch. Over the past few years, the Grade 7 student at Associated Hebrew Schools has performed in Yiddish, Hebrew and English at various Holocaust memorial events in Toronto, and he was featured on a Vision TV documentary. He has also performed in concert halls in Bratislava, Vienna and Prague.



Jakie Young

Jakie studies voice with Elaine Overholt, the vocal coach for the stars of the movie Chicago, and performs a range of music including chazzanut, modern Israeli, jazz, and Broadway. His first CD was released earlier this year.

In Ottawa, he sang first as a solo act, and was later joined onstage by his father, who provided background vocals. He was also accompanied by Ottawa pianist Aviva Lightstone and her son Noam, who played drums.

It was Jakie's second visit to Congregation Beth Shalom West. Last year, he joined about 100 other kids on an NCSY Shabbaton, where, along with a dozen other youngsters, he came up to the bima at the end of Shabbat services to sing what many congregants remember as the most melodious Ein Kelokainu and Adon Olam they have ever heard.

"It literally blew us away", says Beth Shalom West president Hymie Schildkraut. "We knew we had to find an excuse to bring Jakie back so we could hear more."

The anniversary celebration, attended by many community leaders, clergy, and politicians, provided the opportunity, Schildkraut said.

WHEELS OF LOVE

Twenty cyclists from the Toronto area were among 250 riders in Wheels of Love, Israel's largest multi-day charity sports event last month. The five-day, 245-mile ride, benefited Alyn Hospital in Jerusalem, Israel's only rehabilitation centre for children and young adults. More than half the participants in the fifth annual event came from North America. Among the riders were, from left, Renee Halpert, Susan Rubinoff and Bart Carswell.

A new way to look at being over 40

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

With the holidays now a sweet memory, my cookbooks are back on the shelf, and it's time to read for fun. But a true foodie can't leave the kitchen for long. A new novel (with recipes, of course) has me giggling as I rest my weary bones, and have I got a tzimmes for you!

Based on a true story, Cooking for Love is a fun romp by nationally known journalist and food writer Sharon Boorstin, author of the touching memoir, Let Us Eat Cake (HarperCollins).

Miriam Epstein Levy is a married Jewish cookbook author who fantasizes about food, while her divorced best friend, Kate McGrath, fantasizes about an old flame. When Kate Googles her now married former lover and he invites her for a rendezvous in Malaysia – a Muslim country yet – she begs Miriam to come along. But here's the kicker. These two adventuresses are not 25 or even 35. They're 49!

"Women in their 40s and 50s are not too old to have fun," said Boorstin, whose manuscript was turned down by New York publishers, claiming there was no market in this age group for fast-paced, sexy chick lit.

Undeterred, Boorstin took the rebuff as a challenge and published it herself, and in one day an e-mail campaign catapulted Cooking for Love to sales rank No. 23 on www.bn.com.

"Women in their 40s, 50s and beyond apparently agree with me that there is a market for a novel that deals in a fun way with the problems we face – for starters, that we're getting older," noted Boorstin.

When Jewish heroine Miriam gets off the plane in Kuala Lampur in her sensible brown Naturalizers, she's there only as moral support for her eager-for-love friend, Kate, who sports glamorous clothes, newly lifted upper lids and a better-than-Botox, Restylaned brow. And this gal's thongs have nothing to do with feet.

But Boorstin leaves no balabuste behind when it comes to adventure. While Miriam's thoughts seldom stray from food – a bikini wax reminds her of Grandma Estelle plucking a chicken – she claims her share of the, shall we say, action. Where once her ingenuity was confined to exploits of the kitchen kind – cashews and ginger in her latkes, dried cranberries in her tzimmes – Miriam emerges as a bold, plucky heroine, and Boorstin emerges as the consummate storyteller to stir up this wickedly hilarious brew.

IRON CHEF TZIMMES

This is the recipe Miriam invented for the Iron Chef Battle Carrots contest with her daughter, Emma. Good with brisket, roast chicken and other hearty entrees.

vegetable oil spray
1 large yam or sweet potato, peeled and cut into ½-in. thick cubes
3 large carrots, peeled and cut into ½-in. slices
1 cup dried cranberries
1 tsp. salt or more to taste pepper to taste
½ cup honey
1 tbsp. lemon juice
½ cup orange juice
½ tsp. cinnamon

Preheat oven to 375. Spray-oil a 10-cup casserole dish and set aside. In a saucepan, combine the sweet potatoes and carrots, cover with water and bring to a boil. Cover and simmer over low heat 10-15 minutes, until they are fork tender. Add the cranberries and cook for 5 minutes more. Drain well. Add salt and pepper to taste. Transfer the mixture to a casserole dish. In a small saucepan, combine the honey, lemon and orange juices and cinnamon. Bring to a simmer. Pour evenly over the carrot mixture. Bake uncovered about 30 minutes, or until most of honey mixture is absorbed. Serves 4.

MIRIAM'S MALAYSIAN LATKES

Adding Malaysian ingredients to traditional Jewish potato pancakes gets you latkes with pizzazz.

2 large baking potatoes, grated
1 onion, grated
½ cup chopped cashew nuts
½ cup chopped parsley
2-3 tbsp. finely chopped sweet red pepper
2-3 tbsp. finely chopped green pepper
1 tsp. fresh grated ginger
1 tsp. salt
1 egg
1 cup flour
vegetable oil for frying

In a colander, place the grated potatoes and onions and press down repeatedly to drain them well. Transfer them to a large bowl, add the other ingredients and mix well. Using wet hands, shape patties about 2-3 in. in diameter by ¾-1 in. thick, squeezing out the excess moisture. Place the patties in a single layer on a platter, cover and refrigerate until ready to fry.

In a large, heavy skillet, add enough oil to cover the bottom of the pan. Heat to medium-high. Fry only as many patties as will fit without crowding. Cook on one side for 3-5 minutes, or until crisp and brown, then turn over and repeat. Remove the patties to paper towels to absorb the excess oil. To serve, put the patties on a baking sheet and bake in the oven, preheated to 375, for 15 minutes. Serve with yogurt mixed with chopped cucumbers, and salt and cumin seeds to taste. Makes 8 latkes.

Palestinians set date for elections despite internal concerns

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Just days after Palestinian Authority President Arafat's death on Nov. 11, the new PA leaders set a national election date of Jan. 9, 2005, when the 60-day mourning period ends.

The immediate post-Arafat period has been marked by international optimism that progress on the Israeli-Palestinian peace front would now be possible.

But an incident involving gunfire aimed at the entourage of PLO leader Mahmoud Abbas and former PA security minister Mohammed Dahlan made it clear that, despite hopes for a smooth power transfer, tensions over who will lead the Palestinians remained high.

The announcement of the Jan. 9 elections came as U.S. President George W. Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair vowed last Friday to redouble efforts to achieve peaceful and democratic Palestinian statehood under the road map to peace.

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell said Saturday he intended to meet with Palestinian Authority leaders in the very near future.

Meanwhile, the United States has called on Israel to withdraw its forces from Palestinian population centres to facilitate elections, the New York Times reported. An Israeli official denied that there was pressure from the Bush administration, but said the Jewish state would redeploy troops from some Palestinian areas if the PA shows it is serious about fighting terror.

For now, the West Bank and Gaza have largely been quiet – a combined result of mourning, the Ramadan fast and an Israeli decision to reduce military operations to the absolute minimum.

The Israeli army's chief of staff Lt.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon, told Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's cabinet on Sunday that while Israeli troops enjoyed exemplary co-operation with Palestinian security forces during Arafat's funeral in Ramallah, terrorist attacks could resume when Ramadan ends Wednesday.

Violence broke out Sunday, when Associated Press footage showed about 20 men entering the mourning tent where Abbas, Dahlan and other key Palestinian leaders had come to pay respects.

The gunmen, clad in green, shouted, "Abbas and Dahlan are agents for the Americans." They then fired into the tent, killing two bodyguards.

Some of the gunmen shouted slogans calling Abbas, a moderate who has spoken out against violence, an agent of the United States. They also shouted "No to Abu Mazen," referring to Abbas by his nickname, as they walked by him, and began firing shots into the air.

Although the gunmen published a leaflet identifying themselves as members of Fatah and claiming responsibility for an "assassination attempt" on the two, Abbas later denied the incident was an assassination attempt.

"What happened had no political or personal character. What happened was that we came in and began to receive the mourners. Because of the powerful emotions surrounding Arafat's death, it became very crowded and unintentional firing into the air started. We were then advised to leave the premises and we did so.

"I did not hear any calls against me or against anyone. This act is a sign that must be looked at closely – it is the result of the previous situation in the PA. Any responsible person must act so these things do not continue. The people are demonstrating their feelings and sometimes the situation declines, as was the case at Arafat's funeral in Ramallah," where public grief and frenzy could not be controlled.

Despite the incident, Palestinian extremist groups are jostling for a place in the new political order.

Hamas called for wider elections during which it could capitalize on its support among grassroots Palestinians.

"If the Palestinian Authority is able to hold presidential elections, why not hold general elections as well?" said Abu Zuhri, Hamas spokesperson in Gaza.

For now, the ruling Fatah party appears likely to maintain its grip on power. It nominated Abbas as its candidate for the Jan. 9 elections, although no one rules out a run by West Bank Fatah chief Marwan Barghouti, now serving five life sentences in an Israeli jail for orchestrating attacks on Israelis.

Barghouti's influence on the Palestinian street is not lost on Israel, where he was seen using cellphones smuggled into his prison cell last year to broker temporary ceasefires between the various armed factions.

He is considered sincere about a two-state solution and, at 45, is seen as far more dynamic than the 69-year-old Abbas, who quit last year after a short stint as Palestinian Authority prime minister.

At least one member of the Sharon government said Israel could eventually go as far as freeing Barghouti, if he could help it implement the plan to "disengage" from Gaza and the West Bank next year without creating a power vacuum in which Hamas would thrive.

"As part of a future interim or permanent accord, it appears clear that freeing prisoners – including Barghouti – will be unavoidable," Interior Minister Avraham Poraz told Israel Radio.

The idea of clemency for Barghouti was dismissed by other Israeli officials.

Another divisive issue now being discussed centres on Palestinians living in Jerusalem, many of whom would want to vote in elections for Arafat's successor. Under the Oslo accords, Israel agreed that those in eastern Jerusalem could vote in the West Bank for Palestinian posts, but not in other parts of the city.

But there is now some question as to whether this will happen.

"Agreeing to the east Jerusalem Arabs voting for the Palestinian elections in Jerusalem is the first step toward redividing the city," Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom said.

And the Palestinian Authority sees the poll as an opportunity to cement its claim on the city.

"There will be no election without Jerusalem," said Hatem Abdel Qader, a member of the Palestinian Legislative Council. "We will contact all international bodies to exert pressure on Israel to allow the people of Jerusalem to participate."

New Palestinian leadership faces tough tests

By ZE'EV SCHIFF

Analysis

Israel requires a Palestinian leadership that will be efficient and honest, one that will be a partner to combating violence and oppose the use of force for creating realities on the ground.

But there is the danger that the new Palestinian leadership, with all its good intentions, won't succeed in controlling the territories and the myriad Palestinian organizations, even if the new leaders are formally accorded legitimacy by the Palestinian people and its institutions.

The Palestinian leadership that is now taking shape always stood in the shadow of Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat and was unable to deal with his many manoeuvres, including those on the issue of terror. Since his illness, the ascendant group of leaders has acted together in an impressive and effective manner. The leaders were able to prevent internal conflict and to quickly overcome the hysteria generated by Arafat's widow. Their decisions about their leader's funeral and his place of burial also demonstrated restraint.

However, all this is but the beginning of the difficult tests that await the new leadership down the road. It is not sufficient, given the current condition of the Palestinian people, to receive formal legitimacy. Apart from sidelining and neutralizing an extremist like Farouk Kaddoumi (the newly chosen head of the Fatah organization), the new leadership will have to quickly form a coalition with some of the heads of the Palestinian security organizations.

Legitimacy will be meaningless unless it's backed by military and political power. This coalition will also need personalities such as Mohammed Dahlan, Jibril Rajoub and Tawfik Tirawi. The support of Marwan Barghouti, who is serving a prison sentence in Israel, is also important. The latter can play an important role by delivering instructions from prison for Fatah's Tanzim forces to actively prevent the infiltration of negative influences from Hezbollah and Iran that wish to sabotage any hope of a settlement between Israel and the Palestinians.

Several Arab states certainly stand to play a more active part in Palestinian politics and show more involvement in the territories. Egypt's role will be critical. It may continue to play a positive role, as it has done over the past few years, but it might also backslide in negative directions. The Palestinian leadership's influence in this area is important.

The time factor will also play an important role. The standard reflex has been, as we have seen in the past, to procrastinate and to test the other side's intentions. Israel will hold back with its initiatives until the Palestinian side proves it is fighting terrorism. The new Palestinian leadership will put off its fight against terror and violence while it is reorganizing and trying to put the reforms required of it into effect.

As a result, a vacuum will be created, into which negative elements can enter, such as Hamas and Jihad extremists, or Iran and Hezbollah. One side cannot wait for the other to take the first step. Each side must make its own move forward. Sharon could offer to negotiate the disengagement plan, and the Palestinian leadership could – and they have it in their power to – stop the manufacture of Qassam rockets in the Gaza Strip.

Replacements named to key PA posts

By ARNON REGULAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian leadership moved swiftly last week to avert a power vacuum in the wake of Yasser Arafat's death, electing former Palestinian premier Mahmoud Abbas as Palestine Liberation Organization chairman and swearing in Parliament Speaker Rauhi Fattouh as caretaker chairman of the Palestinian Authority.

Under Palestinian law, Fattouh will hold the post until elections are held within 60 days. PA Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia was also granted wide-ranging security and financial powers.

Officials said the unanimous vote by the PLO executive puts Abbas on track to be popularly elected president of the Palestinian government after the 60-day transition.

"We can be certain [the] transition will be smooth, and the Palestinian people deserve to have free and fair elections," Palestinian Cabinet minister Saeb Erekat told Associated Press.

In a hall filled with council members, along with Abbas, Qureia and foreign envoys to the PA, Fattouh pledged allegiance to his new post in front of the president of the Palestinian National Council, Salim Za'anoun, and Palestinian supreme court president Zuheir Surani.

Fattouh tearfully declared that the PA would follow in Arafat's footsteps and adopt his political principles.

Meanwhile, the new leader of the Palestinian nationalist Fatah movement, chosen to replace Yasser Arafat, said last week he was open to peace talks with Israel but also ready to pursue armed struggle if they failed.

"Resistance is the path to arriving at a political settlement," Farouk Kaddoumi told Hezbollah's al-Manar TV station by telephone from Cairo.

"We are not saying we are capable of defeating the Israeli army. But this policy was set out by the PLO when the martyr, our brother Abu Ammar [Yasser Arafat], stood before the United Nations in 1974 and said 'I hold a rifle in one hand and an olive branch in the other. Don't knock the olive branch from my hand'…

"He meant: 'I'm ready for there to be political talks, but if they go astray then we will continue carrying the rifle,' and that's been clear since 1974."

Kaddoumi challenged the emerging Palestinian leadership of Abbas and Qureia by announcing that he has no intention of renouncing his share in Arafat's political inheritance.

"Anyone who thinks that I have abdicated my authority is mistaken, and ought to think again," said Kaddoumi, who did not return to the territories in 1993 with the rest of the PLO leadership because he opposed the Oslo Accords.

His announcement caused consternation in Ramallah, since Kaddoumi, though he has never played an active role in the management of Arafat's Fatah faction, is known to have many supporters both on Fatah's central committee and among Fatah activists in the territories.

Meanwhile, Hamas political leader Khaled Mashal accused Israel of killing Arafat. "I say, and do not hesitate, that I hold Israel responsible for the crime of the death of Arafat… All reports by doctors in the last two weeks indicate he was poisoned," Mashal told Al Jazeera television by telephone.

Last Tuesday, Palestinian Foreign Minister Nabil Shaath told reporters that although the doctors' diagnosis had been inconclusive, "it rules out poisoning totally."

In 1997, two Mossad agents were arrested in Jordan after trying to poison Mashal. Israel provided an antidote and freed Hamas prisoners to get its men released.

"French and Arab doctors may not be able to find evidence, as they could not find proof in my blood when I was poisoned, but Israel was forced then to bring an antidote after two of its agents were held in Jordan," Mashal said.

"Israel, by killing Arafat has killed the peace settlement, and is sending a clear message to Palestinians and Arabs that this will be the fate of whoever rejects a settlement according to Israeli conditions."

Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom dismissed allegations that Israel killed Arafat as "scandalous and false."

Shalom's comments were the first public statement by an Israeli official on rumours that have swirled through the Arab world since Arafat was hospitalized in France two weeks ago.

PLO official Yasser Abed Rabbo announced a 40-day mourning period for Arafat after the announcement of his death on Thursday morning.

Palestinians reacted with tears and tributes to news of Arafat's death.

Palestinian flags at Arafat's battered compound in Ramallah were lowered to half staff. Television broadcast excerpts from the Qu'ran with a picture of Arafat in the background.

In Gaza, mosques blared Qu'ranic verses and children burned tires on the main streets, covering the skies in black smoke. People pasted posters of Arafat on building walls.

There were demonstrations in Khan Yunis and Rafah in Gaza on Thursday morning following the announcement of Arafat's death, Israel Radio reported.

"He closed his eyes and his big heart stopped. He left for God but he is still among this great people," said senior Arafat aide Tayeb Abdel Rahim, who broke into tears as he announced the death.

Hamas and Islamic Jihad expressed sorrow and paid tribute.

Sami Abu Zuhri, Hamas' spokesperson in Gaza, called on the group's supporters to honour Arafat and work toward national unity. "We lost by his death one of our great symbols and one of the main focuses of our national struggle and identity," Abu Zuhri told Associated Press.

Hamas also said Arafat's death would strengthen its resolve to keep up attacks against Israel.

"The loss of the great leader will increase our determination and steadfastness to continue jihad and resistance against the Zionist enemy until victory and liberation is achieved," Hamas said in statement.

Islamic Jihad's spokesperson in Gaza Nafez Azzam said "with hearts full of belief in God's will we mourn President Yasser Arafat, who was a great leader for the Palestinian people."

GA delegates hope to boost Israel immigration

Alina Gerlovin Spaulding, 31-year-old dean of admissions of the American Hebrew Academy, a Jewish boarding school in Greensboro, N.C., recalled how her own family was helped by community donations and efforts. Her father, a one-time Olympic hopeful in the former Soviet Union, had suffered serious complications after a skiing accident and subsequent surgery, before immigrating with his wife and young daughter to the United States.

"Because of your generosity, I have been given every gift in life," said Gerlovin Spaulding, referring not only to the family's integration into the community but to an anonymous gift that facilitated the surgery that saved her father's life.

For the 100 Canadians (and an additional 60-plus Canadian university students), much of the first-day excitement centred around anticipation for next year's GA, scheduled to be held in Toronto. "There's a buzz about it," said Dodi Weill, who is co-chairing the volunteer effort for the 2005 GA.

This year's GA marks the beginning of a process under which programming changes are being assessed and refined for next year, said Ted Sokolsky, president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "They've made an effort to make the program more dynamic. It bodes well for next year."

Israel is not only a product of imagination, it's a producer of imagination, said Shalom, citing his own humble beginnings as a young child who immigrated from Tunisia with his parents.

Now, he said, the time has come for Israel "not to be the only democracy in the Middle East." He stressed that Israel has "never abandoned its desire to live in peace with the Palestinian people, and we will do everything we can to achieve it."

With the death of former Palestinian Authority (PA) president Yasser Arafat, whom he called "the godfather of global terrorism," Shalom said Israel will continue to stress its demand that the PA president's successor lead the Palestinians away from terror and toward a better future for them and for Israel.

"We are ready to talk to any leadership who comes to the table without terror," he said, noting that Israel needs to see change "on the ground."

The Israeli government remains committed to its plan to disengage from Gaza, Shalom said.

He exhorted the audience, including several hundred Israelis, to work together to combat anti-Semitism, increase aliyah and deal with social issues in Israel.

An impassioned Sallai Meridor, chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) executive, said Israel needs Diaspora Jewry for immigration, solidarity and advocacy, just as the Diaspora community needs Israel "as a source of strength, more than just a safety net for a rainy day," as well as for building Jewish identity in young people.

"We have to set a goal for every young Jew to visit Israel," he said, outlining his plan for a joint Diaspora-Israel effort to increase this year's number – 35,000. "The more youngsters in the Diaspora experience Israel, the more we save and the [fewer] we lose."

It would be difficult, but not impossible, he said, to have one out of every two young adults visit Israel on a short-term basis before age 26 and to have one out of five go on an extended stay – all by 2010.

Citing a follow-up survey on the long-term impact of one-year trips to Israel, Meridor said that 10 years later, 59 per cent donate to UJA campaigns, compared to 30 per cent who have not been on such a trip. Ninety-one per cent marry a Jewish partner, compared to 48 per cent of their peers; and 36 per cent (of non-Orthodox parents) send their children to Jewish day school, three times the number who didn't go to Israel on an extended stay.

Marilyn Blumer, a former president of Montreal's FEDERATION CJA, told The CJN that bringing students to the GA is a priority. "It's a wonderful experience for them, a terrific way to connect to the Jewish world. They have a whole track for them [at the GA]."

Leanne Campbell, a graduate student at Yeshiva University who is interning at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, joined other students for a pre-GA Shabbaton and was looking forward to meeting some of the "significant leaders" at the GA, which was scheduled to wind up Tuesday night with a celebratory event.

The Canadian student contingent – including 38 from Toronto – made up a significant percentage of the total number of student attendees, more than 310, representing over 50 campuses.

The Canadian contingent to the GA included UJA Federation of Hamilton president Leslie Lasky and its executive director, Gerald Fisher. [Frances Kraft photo]

Israel not invited

The Palestinians will attend a forum on Middle East democracy co-chaired by the United States and Morocco, but Israel will not. The first-ever "Forum for the Future" to take place Dec. 11 in Rabat, Morocco, will bring together ministers from major industrialized nations and Middle Eastern countries "to promote democracy, rule of law, human rights and open-market economy reforms," said Faryar Shirzad, a top economic official on U.S. President George W. Bush's national security council. Israel was not invited.

Hezbollah's new drone threat

Hezbollah's leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah told a rally in Lebanon last Friday that his fighters, who earlier in the week sent an unmanned reconnaissance drone into northern Israel on a 10-minute sortie, are capable of bombing Israeli targets from the air with the aircraft. The drone that flew over Israel "can be laden with a quantity of explosives, 40 to 50 kilograms and can hit any target, be it water or power plant, a military base or airport, deep, deep into Israel" Nasrallah said. Earlier in the week, Iran admitted supplying Hezbollah with spy drones.

Terrorists: We'll fight on

Palestinian terrorists vowed to continue fighting Israel after Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's death. "The loss of the great leader will increase our determination and steadfastness to continue Jihad and resistance against the Zionist enemy until victory and liberation is achieved," Hamas said in a statement after Arafat's death was announced. The Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, an armed group inside Arafat's Fatah faction, pledged to press ahead with attacks and said it was changing its name to the "Yasser Arafat Brigade." Meanwhile, in Gaza last week, three Palestinian gunmen were killed in a multi-pronged attack on the Netzarim settlement.

Vanunu arrested again

Israeli police arrested former Dimona reactor employee Mordechai Vanunu. Vanunu, who was recently released after serving 18 years in jail for revealing Israeli nuclear secrets to a British newspaper, was arrested last week on suspicion he leaked more state secrets. He has been under surveillance for violating the deal he signed on his release.

UN eyes Israel nukes

The UN nuclear watchdog said ridding Israel of atomic weapons was the key to Middle East peace. "This is not really sustainable, that you have Israel sitting with nuclear weapons capability there while everyone else is part of the non-proliferation regime," Mohamed El Baradei, chief of the International Atomic Energy Agency, told the Sydney Morning Herald.

Anti-Semitism still a priority for European Jews

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — As Jewish leaders from the farthest corners of Europe gathered to assess the past and plan for the future, the fight against anti-Semitism remained their No. 1 priority.

"In the last year, our efforts were concentrated on issues of anti-Semitism, which have been very serious again in Europe. It is a serious issue everywhere," Cobi Benatoff of Italy, president of the European Jewish Congress (EJC), said in a news conference at the group's recent annual meeting.

Also on the agenda were issues related to the enlargement of the European Union, the EU constitution, the proposed admission of Turkey into the union and the EU's relationship with Israel.

Representatives of some 25 countries, including several new EU members, attended the conference, which was held at Berlin's Jewish community centre.

At a news conference, Benatoff said the EJC is planning to meet with EU education ministers to "find ways of introducing into the curricula in Europe subjects that will act as a vaccine against prejudice in our younger generations."

Also essential in the struggle against anti-Semitism is a dialogue with European Christian and Muslim leaders. Roger Cukierman, an EJC vice-president and head of the French Jewish communal organization CRIF, said his group has been actively involved in such dialogue with moderate and less moderate Muslim groups. Perhaps as a result, the leader of one Muslim group issued a statement this year saying that attacks on Jews are like attacks on the Qu'ran.

While Muslim anti-Semitism is a source of great concern, there recently has been a "rise of the more traditional anti-Semitism, from right-wing extremist groups," Serge Cwajgenbaum of France, EJC's general secretary, told JTA. "We can imagine it will continue and even increase."

He suggested that the increase is directly related to the opening of European borders. Recent vandalism against Jewish, Christian and Muslim cemeteries in France's Alsace region has been attributed to German and French right-wing extremists.

In Germany, three extreme right-wing parties have joined forces in hopes of maximizing their support on the European level.

"The more we see the integration of new countries into Europe, the more nationalistic issues will appear," Cwajgenbaum said. "They will use anti-Semitism as a tool to assert their nationalistic view and attitudes."

Stephan Kramer, general secretary of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, stressed the rise in anti-Semitism among left-wing and intellectual circles.

But there is hope for a united front against anti-Semitism, said Henry Grunwald, an EJC vice-president and head of the Board of Deputies of British Jews.

Grunwald praised meetings on anti-Semitism this past year with the European Commission and the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) and suggested it was time to follow through on the "Berlin Declaration," a commitment to improve monitoring and combating of anti-Semitism across Europe made at the April OSCE meeting.

"We feel that both European and national authorities have become pro-active in the fight against anti-Semitism," Benatoff said, "though they are not acting as fast as we would wish."

Despite concerns about anti-Semitism, several Jewish communal leaders stressed in their reports to EJC that relations with government leaders are positive. Representatives of Ukraine and Lithuania said recent political campaigns there seemed relatively devoid of anti-Semitic content.

But several speakers said they were deeply troubled by attacks on synagogues, Jewish cemeteries and schools.

Charlotte Knobloch, a vice-president of both EJC and the Central Council of Jews in Germany, said she was deeply troubled by the level of popular anti-Semitism in the Baltic States and Poland.

"The EJC has a responsibility and a job to do" in educating new EU member states, Knobloch said at the press conference. She recently had learned that one of the few historic synagogues left in Poland, in a city outside Krakow, had been razed and that villas were being built on the spot.

Participants raised other issues, including proposed restrictions on shchitah, or kosher slaughter, and circumcision, in hopes that the European Jewish body would put them on its agenda for the coming year.

One year after the bombing of two synagogues in Istanbul, Daniel Navarro of Turkey reported that there had been no personal attacks on Jews in Turkey. Of greater concern, though, is a subtle change in official attitudes toward Israel, he said.

"Relations with Israel were at the highest level two years ago, and now they [have been] reduced to a normal working relationship," he said. "Turkey is following the attitude of the European Union governments, while wanting to talk about joining the EU."

In his statement to the press, Benatoff stressed the role that Europe might play in helping bring about Israeli-Palestinian peace.

"The roots of the State of Israel are in Europe, and as Europeans we would like to see Europe take responsibility" to help resolve the conflict, he said. "We believe that it can only do so if it has a more balanced approach."

Meanwhile, Flo Kaufmann, vice-president of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, said in an interview that anti-Semitic attacks in England sometimes have corresponded with events on the ground in Israel. She said new figures are about to be released showing an increase in anti-Semitic incidents in Britain over the past year.

Yet "Jewish life goes on, and that is what is quite extraordinary," Cwajgenbaum said.

"We haven't seen the phenomenon," he said, "of Jews hiding their Judaism. This is absolutely not the case with French Jews. Jewish life goes on and continues in opposition to those attacks."

Israel Elwyn serves people with special needs

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

David Marcu, executive director of Israel Elwyn, is anxious to spread the word about the organization.

The Philadelphia native who has been with Israel Elwyn since he made aliyah about 20 years ago, travels here about twice a year to raise awareness of the non-profit organization that serves more than 1,000 children and adults with developmental disabilities in Israel.

Israel Elwyn's services include preschool and adult development centres, work activity centres, supported employment services, transitional employment programs, supported group homes and education services.

Based on one of Israel Elwyn's programs that has a number of clients working at Jerusalem-area hospitals, JVS Toronto recently applied to the Ontario Disability Support Program, and received funding to begin a hospital-based program here.

"Hospitals are a microcosm of the world of work. Almost every type of job can be found there," Marcu says.

In Jerusalem, he says, about 200 clients also receive ongoing support in order to work at jobs in such places as hotels, factories, bakeries, restaurants and government facilities.

The Superior Court of Israel in Jerusalem was the first government institution to hire people for supported employment, Marcu says.

"About 10 years ago, a judge complained that the dusty law books were making their robes dirty. They contracted with us to clean the books and there has been no problem since."

Currently, Marcu says, there are about 200 clients working with 12 job coaches. "The coaches, who are trained by us, deal with the individuals, their family and their employers.

"Most employers would not take a chance on these people because they could not function without support. When employers know that we provide a job coach, however, it is a different scenario."

Israel Elwyn's goal, he says, is to train clients so they can live a less restrictive, more independent lifestyle. "Parents today want their children with special needs to have access to supported employment so they will have a higher quality of life."

On behalf of its younger clients, Israel Elwyn is lobbying the Israeli government to expand the definition of who is eligible for rehabilitative day care centres. "We want it guaranteed that children with special needs receive basic care and the therapy they need."

Marcu, who also visited Los Angeles, southern Florida, Philadelphia and Minneapolis on his recent tour, met with professionals in order to exchange ideas, and with supporters.

"We [always try] to reach out to agencies, such as JVS Toronto, that serve people with special needs. When we develop a professional relationship we learn from each other."

A grant from UJA Federation has enabled Israel Elwyn to increase security by hiring a guard and installing a security system and cameras.

"We cannot make any assumptions in Israel about who is a target."

The Chosen:

A play to exercise your brains

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Adapting a good book into a play can produce theatre that will attract readers. A Toronto theatre company will test this theory by staging one of the most celebrated novels of contemporary Jewish literature.

The Chosen, Chaim Potok's best-selling novel, will run from Nov. 27 to Dec. 12 at the Leah Posluns Studio Theatre.

The company, Teatron, chose Aaron Posner's adaptation, which includes "some foreshadowing from the book's sequel, The Promise," says artistic director Ari Weisberg.

The play's theme centres on religious tolerance, Weisberg says. The Chosen traces a friendship strained by differences in 1940s Brooklyn.

A chassidic boy, Danny Saunders, meets a modern Orthodox boy, Reuven Malter, at a baseball game and they develop a bond tighter than the labels attached by their families.

A question surfaces from this friendship: which way is the right Jewish way?

Behind the conflict over religious divide is the subtext of father-son relationships, Weisberg says.

"Reuven is a straight-thinking practical person who is very close to his father, and spends every evening studying Talmud with him. Danny's father is more old-country Europe with a removed and silent parental approach."

This dichotomy brings up the issue of education and whether teaching children one way excludes other possibilities.

What divides the fathers most is Zionism. Reuven's father hopes for the creation of a secular Jewish state while Danny's father, a rabbi, considers that desire blasphemy until the coming of the Messiah.

Weisberg admits the tempo will be fast-paced to capture all these situations, so "the transitions between the 19 scenes dissolve into each other," he says.

Not only will Potok's writing be one of the key attractions, Weisberg adds, but the American author's ability to balance the various conflicts is a director's wish come true.

The Chosen stars David Frisch as Reuven, Herb Goldstein as Reb Saunders, Jonathan Siegel as David Malter, Neil Steen as Young Reuven and Benjamin Blais as Danny.

First adapted by Aaron Posner in 1999, The Chosen won that year's Barrymore Award for Best New Play and has since been staged across North America.

Posner collaborated with Potok a year before the award-winning author died, and they tweaked the format to fit the stage: Reuven is the on-stage narrator who unfolds his memories as they happen.

Teatron patrons are hungry for intellectual theatre, says Weisberg. "The plays we choose can work both on the surface as an interesting story and also have a subtext so rich and intriguing that people can't help talking about it for days."

Teatron offers an outlet for those ideas by hosting a Thursday night discussion after the show. Weisberg and the cast will talk about the play's questions "that affect lifestyle decisions Jewish people live through."

Weisberg says The Chosen allows thinkers to exercise their brains. "It's open-ended so when you leave the theatre, you can come up with your own way of how the characters end up."

The Chosen runs from Nov. 27 to Dec. 12at the Leah Posluns Studio Theatre, 4588 Bathurst Street. Tickets are $15 to $30. For tickets, call 416-781-5527.

ANNE FRANK MUSICAL YOURS, ANNE BEING STAGED IN TORONTO

The Civic Light Opera Company presents the Canadian premiere of Yours, Anne, a musical based on The Diary of Anne Frank, with music by Michael Cohen and lyrics by Enid Futterman.

Propelled by a young girl's optimism, Anne's uplifting diary still stirs our deepest emotions in a reminder of the innate goodness within us all. Yours, Anne focuses on the famous true story of two Jewish families hidden in an Amsterdam garret during World War II.

While seeming unlikely material for a musical, Yours, Anne bears all the elements of a modern family musical drama and marks the 75th anniversary of Anne's birth. Initially an off-Broadway musical, the show offers haunting and lyrical songs in the style of Fiddler on the Roof. Songs include When We Are Free, For the Children and The First Chanukah Night.

The role of Anne Frank is played by 14-year-old stage veteran Kelly Sanders, Anne's mother is played by Kelly's real-life mother, Susan Sanders, and her father is played by Bob Deutsch. Fairview Library Theatre, North York. Adults $20. Dec. 22 to Jan. 8, 2005. 416-755-1717 or www.CivicLightOpera Company.com.

What's Doing at Israel's: Pierre Lasry, author of Esther, A Jewish Odyssey, launches the English version of the book this week in Toronto. The French edition won an I.J. Segal literary award in 2002.

The book tells the true story of Esther Brandeau, a 15-year-old French girl who in 1735 was forced to flee her city of birth dressed as a boy. In New France, she reconnected with her feminine side and, after having been raised in a convent, rediscovered her Jewish roots. She was one of the earliest-known persons of Jewish origin to set foot on Canadian soil.

The Morocco-born Lasry, who arrived in Montreal in 1957, is an award-winning filmmaker with 27 years' experience at the National Film Board of Canada. by Jill Culiner

Jill Culiner has uncovered a largely forgotten corner of Jewish history. The Fusgeyers fled persecution in Romania in the early 1900s to find refuge in the New World. One hundred years later, Culiner retraces their steps on foot in search of lost remnants of this epic journey.

Culiner, a professional photographer, author and consummate traveller, was raised in Toronto and now divides her time between Canada, Hungary and France. Her exhibition about the Hungarian Holocaust was shown at the Summer 2004 Jewish Film Festival in Budapest.

Jazz singer recorded her debut CD between exams

By KAREN BLISS
Special to The CJN

Sophie Milman claims she never thought she had a great voice, but by the sound of her debut jazz recording that doesn't seem possible.

The 20-year-old Toronto-based singer has a sultry, smoky style capable of injecting youthfulness and spark into such classics as the Sondheim/Bernstein hit I Feel Pretty and Edith Piaf's La Vie en Rose.

"I started off loving jazz. That's the first music that I ever heard," Milman says. "I was never in love with mainstream. I was always many years behind in my musical taste, so this makes sense."

She was born in the Ural Mountains of Russia, south of Siberia, and "a lot east" of Moscow. The family moved to Israel when she was seven, and to Canada when she was 15.

A self-proclaimed perfectionist, the young woman with an amazing knack for languages always thought she would become a doctor or lawyer or "something in business" (which she may well do) but never dreamed of a career in music.

"Never entertained it as a possibility. Every kid sings, right? Well – or not so well," says Milman, sitting in the Second Cup at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, around the corner from where she attends classes full-time at the University of Toronto.

"I didn't have such a great voice when I was younger. I started singing Russian hit songs and Russian folk songs. When I went to Israel, I sang a little. I knew I could carry a tune, but my voice isn't very compatible with mainstream Israeli music, so when I sang that, I wasn't extremely impressed with myself."

Still, she landed a coveted spot in the children's show Festigal, beating out thousand of hopefuls with her rendition of "this weird [Russian] folk song that my mom used to sing me to sleep with."

Her mother, perhaps anticipating another move, encouraged her daughter to learn both Hebrew and English. The Milmans immigrated to Canada in 1999.

On arriving in Toronto, Milman enrolled at Forest Hill Collegiate to finish Grade 10. "It was there that I started getting a really good response to my singing," she recalls. "Five years ago, I walked into music class, and I had no idea that I could sing. I was actually quite intimidated by everybody who was in the club. 'Oh, real singers! Oh my God!'

> 'Five years ago, I walked into music class, and I had no idea that I could sing'

"I started singing this song and everybody was quite impressed and I didn't understand what was so special. The teacher gave me a solo on music night, which was a huge deal because it was a month and a half after I moved here. I was so nervous, I was crying every day. [But] after that music night, I lived from one music night to the next."

Soon after, she attended a singer series at Toronto's RD's BBQ & Grill hosted by Canadian jazz personality/musician/producer Bill King, at which she sang a gospel song. He asked her to return a week later. Next came a call to perform an actual gig. "I literally fell off the chair. I knew about five songs," Milman says.

Ella Fitzgerald, Mahalia Jackson and Sarah Vaughan were essentially her teachers. "I knew how to sing the songs the way they did and how to respond to a song the way their musicians played it," she says. "So if the bass player played anything other than what Ray Brown did on Ella's recording or the piano player played a different chord than Duke Ellington, that would totally throw me off."

After four gigs at RD's, Milman was offered a recording contract with the Toronto independent record label Linus, which has major distribution through Warner Music Canada. "I didn't even take it seriously then," she recalls, laughing. "I went home to study for a mid-term."

Her self-titled debut CD, produced mainly by King with some tracks produced by Danny Greenspoon, with whom she learned to put her own spin on the songs, was recorded between exams. It was released last month. Milman plans to perform, but in between her studies, of course.

"This is mid-term season. It's a four-year program, so I have to stay next year, but I really enjoy it, and for now, I'm able to do both well. I can pull it off with a lot of stress, a lot of break-outs and no boyfriend," she says, laughing. "So I'm going to perform locally while I'm in school."

IGTO Keeping Busy: "Soon after the intifadah began several years ago, tourism to Israel dropped off to not even a trickle," comments Joel Adler, who joined the Toronto-based Israel Government Tourist office as marketing manager in July.

"As a result, the Christian communities across North America have stepped up and recognized Israel's right to exist from a political perspective. They've also been going there in droves to support Israel and the economy, visiting sites of religious significance all over the country."

To encourage more pilgrimages by Canadian Christians to Israel, the IGTO has invited hundreds of Christian clergy leaders to pilgrimage-related seminars in nine cities across Canada. The initiative began in Montreal on Oct. 28 and concludes in Toronto on Dec. 1.

Each event is highlighted with a presentation by Dr. Dan Bahat, a leading Jerusalem archeologist and senior lecturer at Bar Ilan University on the topic, "From Jerusalem to the Galilee – Sacred Sites in the Holy Land at the time of Jesus." Bahat, whose specialty is the Old City of Jerusalem at the time of the Second Temple, is available for the tour because he is a visiting professor this year at the University of Toronto's St. Michael's College.

According to Adler, Israel will have received some 1.5 million visitors this year by the end of December. "That is parallel to where we were before the intifadah began," he said. Interestingly, he has observed that on a per capita basis, more Canadian than American Jews visit Israel.

A former senior designer for Olympia & York Developments Ltd. for 11 years, the Toronto native has also worked for a variety of marketing agencies, telecommunications firms and multinational corporations.

Bitter-sweet chronicle of a father's grief for lost daughter

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to the CJN

This first thing you notice about Stacey's room is how warm it is.

The walls are off-white with soft, blue stripes. The shelves are full of books and photos of her with her friends, in frames.

The blown-up pictures on the walls and the bulletin board are framed and everything about them is joyful.

And then her father, Ned Levitt, points out the boxes filled with her clothes and remembers the day his wife told him that Stacey's clothes didn't smell of her any more.

This is the effect of Ned Levitt's story, which he has chronicled in his book No Mountain Too High (ECW Press, 2004): it is at once bitter and sweet. Bitter as he looks at the last nine years of his life since his 18-year-old daughter was killed when she was hit by a car, and recounts the trauma and devastation he and his family felt.

Ned Levitt

Sweet as he incredulously speaks of the joy he now experiences helping other people who are similarly affected by grief. A joy, he says, he couldn't even conceive of when his daughter was alive.

"I was a good person before Stacey died," Levitt says. "Family was always highest on my priority list. But I did not connect with people the way I do now. I didn't know the unbelievable joy of helping people. I had to bring meaning to the loss. I've been all about making sure her death wasn't meaningless."

He says that determination was part of what fuelled him to write his book, subtitled A father's inspiring journey through grief. A lawyer by profession, he is both soft-spoken and animated when he talks about his daughter and his experience. He speaks of the writing process being therapeutic and, as an aside, adds that he wanted to create something as a legacy for his future grandchildren so that they will know about their aunt.

But more than that, after experiencing the death of a child and working as a volunteer bereavement counsellor for eight years with Bereaved Families of Ontario and then Bereaved Jewish Families, Levitt says he has developed some really strong feelings about dealing with devastation.

"I wanted to tell the world my strong beliefs, my philosophies, and show how some people can rise above the crush."

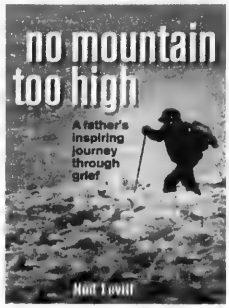
No Mountain Too High follows Levitt from the moment he found out about his daughter's death, to dealing with the immediate shock, to the painful months that followed. Levitt also shows how the memorials he and his family chose to commemorate Stacey's life have helped him deal with the tragedy.

The family had her poetry published in a book titled I Am a Rose through a self-publisher (it is available now through ECW Press), and gave copies of the book to people who made donations to the fund they had set up in her name.

A year after her death, Levitt decided to climb Mt. Ixta in Mexico, a climb Stacey had attempted but was not able to complete because of bad weather. Levitt not only completed the climb, but also placed a fiberglass box on the mountain, which contained her poetry and a blank journal in which others could write messages. His climb was filmed and made into a documentary which aired in 1999 on CBC Newsworld and Vision TV.

All of this, Levitt says, was part of his own healing process.

"I am an extrovert. I have been from the day I was born.... You grieve as individuals, but there are recognized patterns. Men tend to throw themselves into activities. Women are more likely to talk it out. The contact with others, the doing, the climbing the mountain, these are very male things to do."



Grieving, Levitt says, is like being on a wave. There are times when parents crash, pull themselves up, and then crash again.

"You are continually being wounded for months on end," Levitt says. "Not less wounded, more wounded. You believe that you will never be well."

Levitt says it was a five to seven year process before he began "investing in life again." He credits his wife and his other two daughters for giving him the freedom to grieve as he felt he needed to.

"It's wonderful to be a parent again. My daughters lost me for a while."

One of the key points people need to recognize when a parent loses a child, Levitt says, is that parents need to heal before they can be effective parents again. This is something he stresses through his work with Bereaved Jewish Families.

"If you were injured like this physically, you would be in intensive care. But this is an emotional crush. [At Bereaved Jewish Families] we give parents permission to do, or not do, all kinds of things. To get off the parenting wheel so they can get healthy again. It's like the oxygen mask on the airplane. They always say you put it on yourself first and then your child. This is not a time to be heroic."

Time has helped, Levitt says. Whereas there was a time he felt he would never feel well, he says he no longer walks around in pain.

"I've cried my river, my ocean. It isn't pain anymore, but that's hard for people to understand. You know you are carrying around a burden. A momentary ache. But you do get better."

The book has garnered a lot of media attention, including radio interviews with CBC and a guest spot on the Vicky Gabreau Show. Levitt says he hopes to continue doing public speaking and helping others through his experience. His book is another way he can reach out to people who are grieving and need help.

"If I had an aspiration with the book, it will thrill me if people see it for something to be helpful in any situation, if they see it as a book about life. Trauma, death, pain – they teach you about life. You can't appreciate fresh air until you have struggled to breathe."

He pauses and then adds he wants people to recognize that healing is a journey, not a destination. And it is possible to discover joy which outweighs pain.

"I don't know how I'd be now if Stacey had lived. But I suspect I have more purpose in life than most people my age."

Ned Levitt will be speaking at Temple Sinai, Nov. 23 at 8 p.m. on the topic "The Power of Memorials When Coping with Loss."

Putting Lizzies reunions together is a labour of love

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

At 75, Harvey Bronstine is one of the youngest members of the Lizzie's Old Timers Association's – known as the Lizzies – so with all the enthusiasm of youth, he is determined to keep the group going as long as he possibly can.

Bronstine is well aware that the alumni of the Elizabeth Street Playground won't be around forever, but he wants their childhood memories of playing sports together to linger a good while longer.

As an organizer of the association's annual reunion, Bronstine says the get-together provides the opportunity to see many familiar faces at a happy occasion rather than at funerals – which is likely the only other time "the boys," at their age, would assemble.

"It's what you call a labour of love, these last 21 years," said Bronstine, who along with lifelong friend Norm Cornack work on putting the reunions together year after year.

"Just to see guys with a drink in their hand, talking about the old days, that's primarily why we do it. It's very rewarding just to be involved in that," he said.

The Elizabeth Street Playground, located at the site of what is now the Hospital for Sick Children in downtown Toronto, opened in 1913 as Canada's first publicly funded playground. It served as the home of the Lizzies until 1929, after which they played at Central Tech and Jarvis Collegiate.

Bob Abate coached the Lizzies' baseball, softball, and basketball teams, amassing 58 city, provincial and national championships between 1917 and 1946. He was inducted into Canada's Sports Hall of Fame 30 years later.

Bronstine played basketball for five years under Abate in the early 1940s, winning a city playground championship during Abate's last year behind the bench.

In 1983, two years after Abate's death, Lizzie member Mort Greenberg met with Toronto Mayor Art Eggleton and suggested that the Elizabeth Recreation Centre at Montrose Avenue and Bloor Street be re-named the Bob Abate Community Recreation Centre.

The city had commemorated the Elizabeth Street Playground by opening the centre in 1966, but Greenberg's idea was rejected. Instead a plaque was dedicated in Bob's name inside the centre, a small white brick building across from Christie Pits.

As many ex-Lizzies as could be found were contacted and after that ceremony, many who hadn't seen each other since their playing days decided it would be nice to get together again.

A phone committee marshalled them together and in 1984, 184 Lizzies attended their first reunion at the Cambridge Motor Hotel.

At one subsequent Lizzies dinner, Abate's 10-year-old granddaughter gave a stirring speech that caught the attention of Toronto parks and recreation commissioner Herb Pirk, who invited her to the next meeting of the neighbourhood council. Following her speech to that group, the Elizabeth Recreation Centre's was re-named for Abate, ending a tough seven-year battle.

In addition to their reunions, the Lizzies are dedicated to charitable causes. They assist the Woodchippers Bowling League, a group of several hundred developmentally and physically challenged adults, and they supported one of its members who ran a 60-kilometre race to aid breast cancer.

In addition to sponsoring six baseball teams each year in the Toronto Playground League, the Lizzies take part in a homeless softball program that has helped many people get jobs and find a place to live.

"We can see the look on people's faces when they receive help – that's what we're mostly about now," Bronstine said. "We help the little guy that doesn't get help from anywhere."

Bronstine, who knows of about 80 Lizzies who are still alive, is already planning next year's reunion, which will honour the many Lizzies who are war veterans.

He's working on a display that will highlight the 60th anniversary of the end of World War II.

Friendship overcame racism in tennis

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

MIAMI — It is hard for those who watch professional tennis tournaments today to think that Jews and blacks were barred from playing in many major clubs around the world prior to 1968.

At the Athens Olympics this past summer, for the first time in Olympic history, a Jew, Chile's Nicolas Massu, won gold medals in singles and doubles competition. Meanwhile, black Americans Serena and Venus Williams have been multiple winners of both Wimbledon and the U.S. Open over the past two years.

Perhaps because of these outstanding achievements, one would think that Bruce Schoenfeld's new book, The Match (HarperCollins) exaggerates the contempt that many tennis players and tennis club owners once displayed for both blacks and Jews.

However, Schoenfeld's book, which chronicles the friendship between black American tennis champion Althea Gibson and British Jewish tennis player Angela Buxton, is an accurate historical reflection of the tennis world in the 1950s.

Buxton and Gibson played doubles together and won the Wimbledon doubles crown in 1956. Their pairing was as much based on their mutual talent as on the refusal of others on the women's tennis circuit to have either as a doubles partner.

Gibson was the more gifted athletically of the two, winning the Wimbledon and U.S. Open singles titles in 1957-58, but Buxton trained harder and had a stronger mental fortitude for tennis, despite never winning a major singles tournament.

Both women faced huge obstacles in their formative years and Schoenfeld details how each woman overcame discrimination to compete in their chosen sport.

Although both women faced prejudice and discrimination even after retiring from tennis, both possess a strong will and determination to succeed. Between the two, Buxton is portrayed more favourably, as a compassionate person who cared for others. (Buxton raised funds for Gibson in 1995 when she heard her former partner was struggling financially.) By contrast, Gibson is more detached, not at all humble about her ability to win, with the ability to intimidate her opponents by her mere presence.

Action-packed novel teaches important life lessons

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

If you're a sports fanatic, driven by adventure, or simply up for a quick read, be sure to check out Carol Matas' Play Ball!

The second book in Matas' Rosie series, Play Ball!, set in Chicago in 1910, follows a busy girl caught between school, her job as an usher in her father's nickelodeon and her quest to prove that baseball is not just a male's game.

Moving to Chicago has been hard for Rosie, who is having trouble fitting in with her classmates at Garfield Elementary. Horrible Hannah and the clique she leads don't want a newcomer in their group, so Rosie is forced to find friends elsewhere.

When her younger brother, Abe, tells Rosie that one of his baseball team's top players has to sit out of the season's deciding game due to injury, she is finally given a chance to prove herself.

Abe's team, the Chavarim, is desperate for help, and as a girl with a stronger arm than most of the boys she knows, Rosie seems like an obvious solution.

Disguising herself isn't hard for Rosie, who pulls her hair under her cap and calls herself Roy. But will keeping her secret be easy? Will her plan be spoiled or will she save the day?

The rival Tigers are tough competition, and the team has its share of bullies. Can Larry the intimidator scare Rosie out of playing her best? Is her family's support enough to pull her through?

The challenges Rosie faces in 1910, as a young Jewish girl in a religion dominated by men, along with the pressures to be true to herself and others, only intensify her mission to lead the Chavarim to victory.

While Play Ball! is suitable for young adult readers, Matas has filled her novel with themes that apply to Jews of all ages. One of the several recurring issues is discrimination among Jewish youth groups and the pressing need for tolerance.

The differences between the Tigers and Chavarim are obvious. The stereotypes of the two Jewish teams are blatant: Abe calls the fancy uniformed German Tigers "snobs" and his friends call them "goyish golems" and "blockheads"; the Tigers think the Russian Chavarim are "pathetic peasants" and "greenhorns"; and Hannah doesn't know how the Germans can call themselves Jews when they eat bacon and dress inappropriately.

These insults are harsh, but through the insight of Rosie and Coach Kobrinsky, a message of acceptance is instilled in the plot. Rosie says, "We were all Jewish, after all. Shouldn't we be one family?"

Coach Kobrinsky adds, in a lecture to the players, "The Talmud says, 'All men are responsible for one another'... What is the greatest teaching of the Torah?... It is, 'Love your neighbour as yourself.'"

The standards held for girls and boys in the novel develop a theme of sexism, and it is Rosie who advocates against the restrictions Orthodox Jewish women face. After hearing that Hannah's mother will not allow her to go to high school, Rosie is reminded of her own mother's rantings: "Men are keeping women from reaching their potential. And it is bad for the men as well as the women."

By the end of the novel, even Rosie's father insists that "girls should be treated as equals."

The story, aside from being thought-provoking, action-packed and laced with historical detail, is also one of life lessons.

Coach Kobrinsky, the novel's voice of reason, says, "You'll see that this game is very much like your life. It begins, it must end, and everything in between is a tapestry of your choices, others' choices and fate."

To fully appreciate the coach's words, pick up a copy of Play Ball!

As an internationally acclaimed author of more than 30 novels for young adults and as the winner of the Jewish Book Award, the Geoffrey Bilson Award for historical fiction for young readers and the Children's Book Centre's outstanding book of the year, Matas, like Rosie, is an all-star.

How friendship overcame racism

However, it's the friendship between Buxton and Gibson after they retired from competitive tennis that is the main bond described in the book. Both had failed marriages and other problems that took place after their Wimbledon victory.

Although Gibson's achievements in tennis are well known, equal weight is given to Buxton's struggles to overcome discrimination in the three countries she has lived in during her life – England, South Africa and the United States.

Born in 1936, Buxton overcame anti-Semitism by creating other options for herself in tennis. When young Angela was only eight and living in South Africa with her mother to escape wartime England, she was refused admittance to a private club. Instead she played on a public court. When Buxton was later refused admission to the Los Angeles Tennis Club while living in the United States in 1950, the teen received lessons from tennis great Bill Tilden.

In 1953 she competed at the Maccabiah Games in Israel, winning gold. That experience helped pave the way for her outstanding performance a few years later at Wimbledon, where she advanced to the singles final, in addition to winning the doubles crown. Buxton is still the only Jewish woman to have ever been a singles finalist at Wimbledon.

After her retirement from tennis in 1957, following another gold medal at the 1957 Maccabiah Games, Buxton married, had three children and in 1967 lived briefly on a kibbutz before returning to England. She remains an active supporter of the Israel Tennis Centers and has been inducted into the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame.

Yet, she is still not a member of the All England Lawn Tennis and Croquet Club, the site of the Wimbledon Championships, despite having won the doubles title.

According to BBC Radio interviews, Buxton still feels strongly that the club did not want her as a member because she is Jewish.

Schoenfeld's 289-page book details more colourful tales of the joys and tragedies that mark the lives of both women. The Match will deepen readers' insight into the tennis world of the 1950s, a world that is a far cry from the contemporary tennis circuit that has been a boon for both blacks and Jews.

An apple a day

something

By MIRIAM PORTER

Have you ever gone grocery shopping at an upscale, super grocery store in Toronto?

Brightly coloured fruit and vegetables stretch from wall to wall. The produce is literally overflowing, in bins, bushel baskets, crates and on shelves. When one variety of fruit or vegetable is low, an employee replenishes the supply from the back.

All the food is patiently waiting to end up in someone's shopping cart. The choices are endless. Seven varieties of crunchy apples, four brands of savoury tomatoes, baby carrots, medium-sized and monster-sized carrots, fresh juicy oranges and grapefruits, a whole organic section, and every kind of herb for your salad or stir fry. There are blueberries, blackberries and strawberries, from California, whose prices reflect they are out of season. And that is just the produce section. Every type of food you could ever imagine can be purchased at an upscale, super grocery store.

We are fortunate to be able to shop at such stores and buy whatever we want. Many of our ancestors either perished in or survived the Holocaust. I am quite certain they would have loved to eat just one apple a day during those horrible years. We have all seen the pictures and heard the stories; I don't need to remind you.

Looking at the food also reminded me of the people I have befriended who live on the street. They would like to eat an apple a day, too. Many of them are much younger than me. And many of them are twice my age. But they are all hungry.

Employees of organizations and outreach programs drive around the city in vans with hot soup, coffee and sandwiches, doing work that is crucial to the survival of many people. The food banks around town and the volunteers who help really do make a difference.

My friend just gave me a pair of brand new black boots and a warm fleece jacket for someone I know on the street. Another friend took a man in need out for a delicious Chinese dinner. I know a woman who used to bring a homeless man fresh, homemade muffins to his home in a park on a regular basis. She always placed a red rose on his tray.

We can do numerous acts of kindness on an individual basis such as the ones mentioned. When we appreciate how lucky we are, this will come naturally. We should never take grocery shopping or food for granted. It is so easy to forget what we have when it becomes a routine in our lives.

We should never take food for granted

Some of us assume our parents, our partner or our roommate will bring home the groceries. Some even order food online and it miraculously arrives at our doorstep the next day. But so many people are much less fortunate than we are. If everyone who reads this newspaper buys something extra for a person in need next time they go grocery shopping, it will make a difference. Put a few extra apples in your bag – I promise you won't regret it.

A lesson in pluralism

Seymour Epstein

In a recent Torah parshah (Chayei Sarah), we are told of Abraham's servant praying to God in the city of Nachor. In this, the first private prayer of a man seeking God's help, the servant refers to the Lord as "God of my master Abraham."

In a later chapter of the Torah (in Yitro, the parshah of the Ten Commandments), we learn that after Yitro brought Moshe's wife and sons to the desert to be with Moshe, Yitro, as a Midianite priest, offered sacrifices to God, after which Aharon, our high priest, came with the elders to partake of the meal. This is probably the first ecumenical service recorded in human history!

While pluralism, as a given of present-day Jewish communities, is a fairly new concept, it would seem that this operational value has its conceptual origins in our earliest traditions. If Abraham's servant could pray to a God whom he identifies as his master's deity, we are witnessing the ability to identify and respect realities other than our own while maintaining our own identity and belief structure.

If Aharon and our elders could show respect for the cult of Midian and eat of their sacrifices immediately before the revelation at Sinai and the giving of the Torah, our faith is not dependent on the negation of other beliefs.

A true pluralism need not, with dangerous relativism, reduce all positions to minimal beliefs that are universally accepted. Rather, it can permit competing authenticities while deeply respecting the position of the believer. In communities such as ours, it encourages civil debate without the hypocritical lip-service to "Jewish unity." While it is of obvious use in community classrooms, where differing ideologies and various indifferences to Jewish life co-exist, it might also, one day, be acceptable in more homogeneous settings with one clear ideology.

For it is the case that a sincere pluralist is confident enough in his or her own beliefs to be able to understand and empathize with those of the other.

Rabbi Yossi rocks Beth Torah

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

There is a rat pack of new spiritual leaders in the Toronto Jewish community – individuals who are introducing progressive approaches to Torah and Jewish practice.

This group includes Eli Rubenstein, spiritual leader (currently on hiatus) at Congregation Habonim, who has managed to grow his shul through his universal approach to Judaism and his gift of storytelling and humour. It also includes Rabbi Debra Landsberg at Temple Emanu-El, who is pursuing a course of innovative Torah study.

Another member of this quietly influential rabbinical rat pack is Yossi Sapirman of Beth Torah Congregation near Dufferin and Lawrence.

Yossi has brought his knowledge of Judaism and Torah to a well-established place of worship and, together with a congregation of spiritual explorers, has transformed it into an interactive and creative place that represents the true spirit of acceptance and community.

As one new member, Harold Wolkin, told me, "I love to attend shul, because Beth Torah has given me a fresh perspective on Judaism."

Rabbi Yossi makes learning at Beth Torah exciting. With a certain non-judgmental sweetness, but bold stubbornness, he has breathed new Jewish life into congregants' hearts – while demanding that they share in this constant birth and rebirth.

Recently, Beth Torah's congregational school – called "Hebrew's Cool" – held "animal day," when students were encouraged to bring their pets to shul to learn about the Jewish way in animal care. They heard the story of Rebecca and her rush to give water to Eliezer's camels, and of Noah's obligation to feed the animals on the ark before feeding himself.

A short while ago, Rabbi Yossi taught students about Judaism and the environment by taking a group of them to a fish hatchery, where the young congregants physically played a role in releasing the farm-harvested fish and replenishing our lakes and streams.

Beth Torah has a heimish warmth that makes all its members feel spiritually cozy.

Every Shabbat, as the rabbi and Cantor David Young stroll down the aisle with Torahs in hand, they literally welcome each member in attendance by stopping, looking into their eyes, extending their hands and wishing them "Shabbat Shalom" and a commendation for committing their Saturday morning to their Judaism.

The effect that this simple, and time-consuming, effort has on each member is immense. It encourages loyalty and, no doubt, a will to enhance Beth Torah. It's not surprising that the shul's membership has doubled from 200 to 400 families in the last few years. It's also easy to appreciate why 300 people attended a recent Friday night dinner at the synagogue.

"I never asked myself what the importance is of what I'm doing," Yossi told me. "I love my work more and more every day."

He is passionate and dynamic, and is forever growing as a Jew and a leader. When we met, he imparted some very refreshing insights, such as, "The children in our shul are full members," and "Whenever you attend shul, you are a regular." Another bit of wisdom: "We respect our members where they are at philosophically and work with them from their starting point, not mine."

Beth Torah was once a small, unassuming shul outside the Bathurst Jewish mainland. It is now a bastion of dynamic Judaism, transformed by a talented rabbi with an unbridled love for the Jewish people, and a gutsy board and membership who are building on their rich history and creating a place where Torah and community are colourful and inclusive. The shul just rocks!

I am proud of my old roommate Yossi. I am thrilled for Beth Torah. Perhaps unbeknownst to them, its members are innovators on a refreshing Jewish journey and role models for an even more effervescent Jewishness in Toronto.

Richmond Hill CC offers service and food that's second to none

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Richmond Hill Country Club (905-731-2800) is now hosting kosher functions, with food prepared by Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers, says Lino Ferreira, director of food and beverage at the club.

"We are planning a kosher kitchen, but now all our kosher needs are met through Zuchter Berk," he says.

Guests having parties at the club – they don't have to be members – can expect superior service, says Ferreira, who was trained in hotel management in his native Portugal. After coming to Canada in 1961, he spent 32 years with Four Seasons Hotels and Resorts. He has been with Richmond Hill Country Club for five years.

His wait staff, which he trains himself, offer service "equal to the best," he says.

Before a waiter begins serving on his own, says Ferreira, "he works on simple tasks and I follow his progress. When he does start to serve, he is fully experienced."

Dinners are always French service. "Wait staff wear white shirts, bow ties, black pants or skirts, and black shoes, and while serving hors d'oeuvres, they wear white gloves. When guests arrive, they know they are at a formal function."

Meals are never served plated, he says. "The soup is ladelled individually, and the appetizers and main course are served from a large platter that has been kept hot under a heat lamp. "It stays much hotter that way, because plated food tends to cool down."

Two waiters serve three tables, he says, for added insurance that the food will be hot and guests' needs will be served.

The dining room is elegant, says Ferreira. "Tables are covered in white damask cloths and topped with 18-inch round mirrors and votive candles. The mirror reflects the centrepiece and the candles."

Guests can count on getting top quality food, he says.

Parties can start with hot or cold hors d'oeuvres, including mini beef Wellington morsels with peppercorn dipping sauce; steamed Oriental chicken parcels with orange zest served with hoisin sauce; white fish lemongrass sticks with thyme-infused honey dip; or twice-baked mini-potato filled with roasted garlic and wild mushroom ragout.

Lobby stations include a harvest table, sushi station, satay station, beef carvery station, mashed potato martini bar, tapas table or pad tai station.

In addition to appetizers of soups, pastas, fish and salad, guests can order enhanced appetizers such as pan-seared citrus sea bass with angel hair fruit slaw and fried banana garnish; charred rare tuna on Asian vegetable salad with a mild wasabi vinaigrette, garnished with crispy noodles; or a phyllo cup filled with wild mushroom ragout.

Main courses include supreme of chicken filled with wild mushrooms, wild rice and pine nuts, served with a red wine shiitake reduction; mustard and horseradish crusted beef filet with a roma tomato jam; seared teriyaki salmon with crisp fried onions and a lemongrass glaze or veal ragout with shallots, mushrooms and a chardonnay wine sauce.

Grilled vegetable towers served with a roasted red pepper sauce, caramelized red onion and sage risotto cake; or wild mushroom ragout in a phyllo rose, among other choices, can be served as a vegetarian alternative.

When guests book a party, says Ferreira, they get the entire upper floor of the club, so their function is private.

"The ballroom, which holds 270 people with dancing and up to 350 without dancing, has a patio and balcony that overlook the tennis court, golf club and trees."

Having a party at Richmond Hill is easy for guests, he says. "We help plan it from the beginning, and we take pride in ensuring that every guest is happy at the end of the night."

Guests can count on top quality food at Richmond Hill Country Club.

Inject some magic – or stilt walking, or hypnosis – into your party

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Looking to inject some excitement to your simchah? Adam Swaye has the answer to any dull party, and it comes in the form of jugglers, magicians and other performers.

Swaye, magician and owner of Swaye Entertainment (416-545-0741), knows his magic. He has performed for the Raptors' half-time shows and at Toronto Maple Leaf Tie Domi's holiday party, as well as at Casino Rama, Casino Windsor and Great Blue Heron casino in Port Perry.

"I'm one of the best at what I do," he boasts.

Swaye performs traditional card and coin tricks, but that's not all. He has the magical ability to steal watches off people's wrists without them knowing, and at the end of an evening, Swaye will have collected a fair number of them.

How does he do it? He can't tell. A magician never reveals his secrets.

"When you see me perform, you never know what will happen," he says.

Swaye provides the same type of entertainment for bar and bat mitzvahs. He works closely with party planners and has also been booking other live entertainment acts for more than 10 years.

But his magicians and entertainers aren't 18-year-olds looking for after-school cash, but professionals with years of experience on the job, he says.

"I've been around for long enough to see the trends and other people come and go," he says.

But the fun isn't limited to magicians. Swaye Entertainment has a roster of mimes, hypnotists, caricaturists, psychics, stilt walkers and other performers.

Swaye also provides large inflatable games, play casinos, fire shows and tribute bands.

Whether you're considering a magician or a stilt walker for your big event, Swaye recommends keeping a few things in mind.

Customers should know what type of show they want at their simchah, the number of expected guests and the size of the location. For example, a fire show or even a juggler might not be a feasible idea if there are too many guests and too little space.

Swaye also suggests that customers know how much they are willing to spend so he can tailor the entertainment to their budget.

Finally, Swaye suggests that customers know the tempo of the event and what type of role they want entertainers to play, whether it's a small corner distraction at a cocktail party or a big production for a corporate event.

Swaye has recently expanded into the talent business "for people looking to get into the acting world," he explains. He currently represents emerging stars such as Mike Benhaim and Jessica Baker.

Fairmont Royal York Hotel preserves a tradition of elegance

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Located at 100 Front St. West (416-368-2511), The Fairmont Royal York Hotel – known more simply as the Royal York – is the grande dame of Toronto's hotels, and one of the world's great meeting places. To many Canadians, it is still the epitome of luxury hotels.

Completed on June 11, 1929, the Royal York was then the tallest building in the British Empire. Today, though several glass-and-steel towers exceed it in height, its distinctive structure continues to attract the eye and it still offers a commanding view of Toronto harbour.

"From the day of its completion," says Melanie Coates, regional director of public relations for the hotel, "the Royal York has been much sought after. For those heading overseas or returning, it has always been a rendezvous."

The Imperial Ballroom, a legendary venue for banquets and top-flight entertainers, has been compared to New York's Rainbow Room. In the 1930s, dinner guests heard big bands play here, and through the '40s, '50s and into the '60s, the ballroom hosted such stars as Tony Bennett, Guy Lombardo and the Supremes.

Coates recounts how, during the '40s, the Imperial Room hosted servicemen and women in uniform, on furlough from the front. To this day, every Remembrance Day, there is a ceremony in the lobby to honour these men and women, in which an employee who was in the service takes the salute.

In the '70s, the Imperial saw a shift to business use, and in the '80s and '90s to conventions. Now it also hosts social events such as gala weddings.

With its fine carpets, polished brass fittings, marble floors and wainscotting, gold leaf on travertine columns, and glittering chandeliers, The Fairmont Royal York preserves an older, warmer tradition of elegance. Upscale shops and restaurants in the concourse add to the ambience.

In 2003, The Fairmont Royal York, won the Inaugural Award for the Toronto Hotel Association. A glowing review, and from competitors at that!

Gordon MacDonald, director of conference services and catering (416-860-4539) at The Fairmont Royal York outlines the hotel's diverse catering services.

In the Canadian Ballroom, 1,000 guests can sit down to dinner at round tables. The Imperial Ballroom can seat 300 at dinner; the Concert Hall, 600. And the room called simply The Ballroom – most beautiful of all, with its 20-foot vaulted ceilings and frescoes done in 1929 – can seat 350 at round tables.

There's also plenty of space for smaller events. On the 19th floor, there are nine rooms for 10 to 50 people each. Accessed by express elevators, the rooms have panoramic views of the lake.

The recently renovated Epic, the hotel's signature restaurant, seats 150 comfortably in a calm, elegant ambience of yellow and beige. Within the Epic's single room is space for a private party of up to 14. The menu is contemporary French, but with Ontario influences: it includes venison, for example. Also, the Epic offers Canada's largest Vintner's Quality Alliance (VQA) wine list.

The Benihana's main attraction is the talents of its chefs, as they perform astonishing feats of table-side Japanese cooking. It can seat 120 for events such as birthdays, and it has takeout sushi!

MacDonald confidently asserts that the Library Bar, haunt of former prime ministers and leading lights such as media theorist Marshall McLuhan, has the best martinis in the city. It also offers light foods for lunch and dinner.

Conventions bring thousands of people to The Fairmont Royal York. For these, the hotel works with the Metro Toronto Convention Centre: the hotel hosts the convention's headquarters and premiere events, while the convention centre hosts more of the meetings.

"One Saturday," says MacDonald, "we had an Opera Ball fundraiser for 350 guests. The president of Mongolia and his delegation occupied 50 rooms. There was a winemakers' dinner in the Epic restaurant, hosted by the Italian winemaker Frescobaldi; there was a wedding for 250; and a bar mitzvah in the evening for 150 guests.

"Next day, Sunday," he continues, "we hosted 550 people with the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University. There was a Jewish wedding with 250 guests and there was a private brunch in the Epic. We're professional multi-taskers."

The Fairmont Royal York has plenty of contact with the Jewish community. For three of the past four years, for example, the hotel has hosted the annual UJA dinner for 600 people. Kosher catering is handled by GMB Culinary.

MacDonald points out that under one roof, The Fairmont Royal York offers everything you need for a party, from flowers to limousines.

Sharing Coates' pride in The Fairmont Royal York, MacDonald says: "They don't build hotels like this anymore. We're classic in design, contemporary in approach. And we turn moments into memories."

Relax with a massage and music from Rick Levine

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to the CJN

Imagine the stress on your wedding day – the makeup, the hair, the photographs. Making sure everything is co-ordinated. Now imagine taking a break to unwind with a five-minute chair massage.

That's exactly the luxury Rick Levine offers bridal parties through his company RelaxFX.

"Seated massage is a brief, affordable massage which is done while you sit in a specially designed portable chair," Levine says.

"It's given by a professionally trained, certified chair massage practitioner. The massage, which uses no oil and is applied through clothing, addresses the head, neck shoulders, back and arms and creates a sense of well-being throughout the whole body, leaving the receiver relaxed and rejuvenated."

RelaxFX seated massage is available to come to any celebratory, recreational or business event, including membership drives, fundraising events, grand openings, weddings and bar mitzvahs, Levine says. Clients only need to arrange the time and space. The specially designed seat can be dismantled and assembled in almost any location.

Rick Levine (background) now offers a seated massage.

Lasting anywhere from five to 30 minutes, massages are the perfect addition to any wedding party's "must-have" list, Levine says.

"We can put everybody in a very relaxed, positive state of mind."

Levine, a trained seated massage practitioner, was introduced to seated massage in the United States, where it is popular in Chicago and New York. He says in Canada it can be found mainly at trade shows and fundraising events – "but I'm the first one that I know of to introduce it to the party planning public."

Clients have even had Levine send massage practitioners to their offices for employee appreciation days.

"Instead of flowers or a box of chocolates, management is now providing seated massage to staff in appreciation of work well done."

For more information on seated massage, Levine encourages clients to visit www.relaxfx.com.

Alternatively, you can get a free sample by going to the winter party planning trade show, called the Toronto Party Guide, on Tuesday, Jan. 18 at the Premier Banquet Hall. Levine organizes the Toronto Party Guide three times a year in partnership with experienced party planner Lynn Cohen. They recently hosted the fall trade show at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

"We had hundreds of people turn out for demonstrations, samples and a chance to meet the people they will be hiring for their simchahs… The most common comment I hear from people who attend the event is, 'Why didn't I know about this before when I made my first bar mitzvah or last child's wedding?'"

At the last event, more than 70 companies had exhibits from virtually every aspect of the party planning industry, including photographers, videographers, invitations, bands, DJs, décor rentals and, of course, on-site seated massage.

For those who missed the last trade show or can't make the winter one, Levine is already planning the spring show, to be held Tuesday, April 5, at Beth Sholom Synagogue.

People can also visit Levine's website, www.torontopartyguide.com, which has photos from the shows and links to vendors' websites.

"It's a fountain of information," Levine says of the site. "And it's free."

When he's not giving massages or planning party trade shows, Levine keeps his hand in the music industry with his Good Vibrations Band (formally known as the Rick Levine Band).

Levine, who has been in the music industry for 25 years, says he is always looking for new concepts and new ideas. The band has its own website, www.goodvibrationsband.com, where potential clients can hear clips, see video and view all the details of the band, including a song list.

Good Vibrations has also produced a professional quality demo CD. Those interested in hearing it can contact Levine at 905-881-6400 or send him an e-mail at rick@torontopartyguide.com.

A massage should be on your 'must have' list, Rick Levine says.

Registries bring a couple's wish list to life

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

If selecting the perfect gift for an engaged or soon-to-be-married couple seems overwhelming, gift registries may be the answer.

"The nice thing about the registry is that it is a specific wish-list. When couples walk in, they select what they want… based on their specific likes and dislikes," says Jackie Chiesa, manager of William Ashley, the china, crystal, silver and giftware giant.

"It makes things as easy as possible."

Boasting 24,000 square feet, William Ashley offers a huge selection of products, including everything from vases and candlesticks to household appliances and picture frames.

Chiesa says the store has consultants who will spend an hour with brides and grooms to help them put together a registry that "complements the couples' lifestyle."

While the range of popular items varies, dinnerware is always in style, she says.

"People are still choosing dinnerware because they need it every day," Chiesa says.

"It's amazing how many men gravitate to the gourmet shop for knives and gadgets. People are also thinking about entertainment, both casual and formal."

So how should a couple compile the registry that is best suited to them?

"When they are trying to choose a registry service, they're not only trying to think what will be great for me, but what will be great for my guests," Chiesa says.

To that end, she says, couples should consider what is most convenient for their guests, noting that William Ashley offers registry services online and provides couples with personalized websites.

"The website is becoming increasingly popular," Chiesa says.

"Everybody has limited time and [with the website], people can choose gifts at their leisure. The guests can access the online registry, look at what the couple has selected and actually buy a gift online."

Chiesa says William Ashley's online registries have some unique attributes.

"We have a service called gift notification, [whereby] when the guests make a purchase, we send out an announcement to the couple that says who the guest is, where they live and what they have chosen. This allows them to keep track of what is being bought for them," she says.

As the notifications flow in, Chiesa says, the couple may want to change their wish-list.

"They're not committed," she says.

"At any time, we can make changes to the registry. It leaves you with a lot of flexibility."

Chiesa notes that William Ashley registries also offer some special features, such as highlighting that the couple prefers a certain type of product.

Along with a registry, William Ashley provides various wedding-related services in-house.

"We have a stationery shop for the couple to do invitations… and we have partnered with a florist for the couple to choose flowers," she says.

William Ashley also offers free gift boxing and free delivery anywhere in Ontario for products over $95.

Chiesa encourages couples to visit the store before deciding on a registry.

"They need to do some preliminary research so they can come way with some ideas and a focus," she says.

William Ashley has locations at 55 Bloor St. West in Toronto and at Square One in Mississauga at 100 City Centre Dr.

To reach the Toronto location, contact 416-964-2900. To phone the Square One store, dial 905-566-8500. The website address is www.williamashley.com.

Keeping up with the Cohens

By JANICE O'BRIGHT
Special to The CJN

At 13, David has an idea of what he wants for his bar mitzvah. After all, he's been to at least 30 parties in the last six months. He's seen everything from a backyard barbecue to the top of the CN Tower. In between, David has been entertained, dined and given gifts by family and friends. Now it's David's turn to celebrate his coming of age.

David's parents have been preparing for this momentous occasion for the last two years. They set their date. They worked through a number of ideas for the special weekend. There has been no shortage of suggestions from family and friends. They've talked to a couple of party planners, banquet managers and DJ services. Little wonder David's parents feel so much pressure.

As much as David is being educated on the principles of the Torah, Mom and Dad are being educated on the 21st-century bar/bat mitzvah. Things have changed over the last 25 years, and David's parents are finding out first-hand what those changes are:

Sticker shock: bar and bat mitzvahs cost a lot more than they did 25 years ago. We put more into the affair than ever before. What's too little? What's enough? What's too much? It's all about finding the right balance for your family. This is easier said than done.

The generations: pleasing your guests of all ages has become far more challenging. Making the night enjoyable for great-grandparents, grandparents, contemporaries and siblings can mean conflicting plans at times.

High expectations: David's generation and that of his parents have been raised on increasing expectations. It's no surprise that bar and bat mitzvahs have grown from simple celebrations to major affairs.

So how do you work through these pressures and still have a successful affair?

I asked this question of a number of women whose affairs were so full of spirit and love that you could feel the energy. What these women all had in common was that they had a plan, built a team and always kept focused on what was important to them.

So how do you develop a plan? A good place to start is with a simple question – Why am I doing this? The parents and the child really need to talk about what is important to them. A bar or bat mitzvah is not about keeping up with the Cohens. It's an expression of what's inside, not what's outside. If you declare your expectations and resources at the beginning, you will face less pressure right from the start.

The team brings your plans to life. Choose your team members with great care. Look for experience and perspective. Are they open to your ideas? Do they add value? Can they deliver? A good team looks out for you and is there for you – all the way. Let your team be your pressure absorber.

Whether you are making a Shabbat dinner with a dvar Torah being delivered by your child or a lavish party held at a top venue, what really matters is never losing site of why you are throwing this party. It's to share in a celebration of Jewish life. It's the goodwill, warmth and sincerity of the family and friends that make the party a success. Everything else is window dressing.

In the excitement of this special occasion you can easily lose sight of how to handle the pressure. You know David is going to have a good time being the centre of attention with all his friends in the room. It's easy to see how David's parents could get caught up in the whirlwind. The more you see and hear, the more you want to do. It's only natural. That's why you need a plan, a team and a focus to make sure your night is everything you want it to be – on your terms.

Wedding party attendants play ceremonial roles

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Co-ordinator

One of the highlights of a traditional wedding ceremony is the bridal procession.

The attendants' attire is co-ordinated to blend with the floral colour scheme and overall décor. Since members of the bridal party include the couple's intimate family and friends, guests get a glimpse of the newlyweds' inner circle.

Today it is not uncommon for people to pick up and move by the time they graduate from university. However, weddings are one of the happy occasions when childhood friends make an effort to attend despite the distance and cost.

After being away for years, former buddies may lose track of the bride and groom's family and friends. In some cases, out-of-towners attend a wedding and may not even recognize a younger sibling of the couple who has reached adulthood. In other instances, they may have seen photos and heard about that brilliant kid brother at Harvard but never had the opportunity to meet him. It is exciting to spot him as best man in the wedding procession. Rules vary regarding the number of bridal attendants or their particular functions.

One couple may opt for a maid or matron of honor, several bridesmaids, flower girls, page boys, a best man, several ushers, parents and grandparents. Second marriages are common and many brides are pleased to have their stepmothers and stepfathers join the procession. It's the couple's choice. Some prefer to keep it simple with a best man, a couple of bridesmaids and ushers, and their parents.

The couple's parents oversee the entire wedding and greet the guests. They try to support their children at all stages of preparation. Ideally, harmony should prevail.

The maid or matron of honor is usually a sister, sister-in-law or best friend of the bride. She is the bride's chief attendant. Duties may vary, but invariably she offers the bride moral support. The maid or matron of honor arranges pre-nuptial parties, showers and teas. She often toasts the bride at the reception.

The bridesmaids are relatives and friends of the bride. In ancient times, a bridesmaid's function was to protect the bride against evil by emulating the bride's mode of attire. This would confuse the evil spirit as to the identity of the real bride. Bridesmaids were supposed to shower the bride with gifts. By showering the bride, the bridesmaid got the couple off to a good start.

Flower girls and pageboys are nieces, nephews or close friends of the bride and groom. They range from pre-school age to under 10. Flower girls precede the bride and pave the way with floral petals. Pageboys trail after the bride holding her train.

The best man assumes an esteemed role in the groom's lineup. He needs to be organized and dependable to carry out numerous duties. He attends prenuptials, plans the bachelor party and is involved in the rehearsal.

Just as the bride selects bridesmaids, the groom picks ushers. If it's a formal wedding, the male attendants dress accordingly.

It is appropriate for every male and female attendant to conform to the couple's colour scheme and dress code. The entire party's stylish demeanor is documented for years to come in the couple's wedding photographs and videos.

Website can help you find a simchah venue

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

With so many party venues in the Toronto area, choosing the perfect place for your affair may seem like a formidable challenge.

Enter www.venuesource.ca, an online directory that boasts a database of popular event-hosting locations.

With a photo gallery and virtual tours, the website illustrates and describes exactly what each venue listed has to offer.

"Instead of traveling all over the city, you can use the site as a tool to help you with your search [for the right venue]," says venuesource.ca president John Fruitman.

"It's a great time saver and... it shows you exactly what you should be expecting from the venue."

The virtual tours function like a mini-video, with a moving camera shot of the setting and written descriptions of the décor and services offered.

Fruitman says the site aims to include as many details as possible about each location.

"We try to include any information that is pertinent to the person who is hosting the party," he says, noting that particulars about the capacity, catering services and even a map with directions, are all laid out.

"For instance, if you want your own caterer, the 'details' link on venuesource.ca tells you whether the venue permits third party caterers," he says.

"If you're planning a bar mitzvah and you want it to be informal and fun, you can browse through the list [of venues] and find what you're looking for."

Fruitman strongly encourages you to visit a site when searching for an appropriate place to hold your simchah.

"You should always visit the venue to be sure it is exactly what you want," he says.

"Make sure that the tone you try to convey at the party matches well with the tone of the venue."

In other words, if a party is supposed to be classy and elegant, or fun and informal, seek out a location with those characteristics.

Pay attention to the amenities offered at the venues and how they are aligned with the architecture, Fuitman advises.

For example, acoustics will affect the sound capabilities of a band or DJ. Other things such as lighting, the size of a dance floor, seating styles (theatre, round table, etc.) and the variety of rooms offered (such as a gaming room or a terrace) are all important to note.

To make his site user friendly, Fruitman has included contact information for the specific person you need to speak to at each party venue, as well as direct links to the venues' own websites.

Fruitman says there are currently 20 locations showcased on the site, and he anticipates the list expanding as he works in tandem with event planners and caterers.

"I work with event planners such as Up and Coming Events and they help ... with getting more venues to sign up," he says.

Fruitman says many people don't realize that certain destinations in Toronto are available for affairs, and visiting the site is a great way to see what's out there.

"When people find out you can host a party at the Science Centre, for example, they are totally surprised," he says.

"Our site will help inform you about all kinds of venues."

To speak with Fruitman, contact 416-833-4636 or e-mail info@venuesoruce.ca. You can surf the site at www.venuesource.ca.

What to look for when chosing a caterer

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

There are plenty of kosher caterers out there, so how do you choose one for your party and work with them to achieve optimum results?

David Berk, president of Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers (416-386-1086, www.zuchter-berk.com), and Perla Azulay of Ely's Fine Foods (416-782-3231, www.elysfine-foods.com) have plenty of advice to offer.

"Cold calls from the Yellow Pages are rare," Berk says. Usually, people have some idea what they want within a range of three to five possibilities, but they make a choice after seeing one or two caterers, he says.

First, Berk and Azulay advise, look at a caterer's experience and reputation. If you've been to affairs they've catered, you already know something. Consider testimonials and word of mouth.

Then look at what Berk calls the "three Ps: people, product and price."

Azulay agrees that the people factor is crucial. "The caterer isn't there to do business, but to make you and your guests happy," she says. "This has to matter to your caterer as much as it does to you. For me, it's not just about getting a client, but keeping them. That's how my business grows."

As to product, both caterers advise you to consider your guests' different tastes and levels of sophistication. At an all-ages event, these will vary more than at a corporate event.

It's possible to get quality catering even on a modest budget, Berk says. "On the other hand," he warns, "prices that are too low might make you wonder what they're leaving out."

If you haven't made up your mind, say both caterers, your first meeting is the time to see if you have basic rapport. Talk price and product, and find out if the caterer has any special ideas.

Let the caterer know about the guests, Berk and Azulay advise. Are they old? Young? Traditional? Sophisticated? At an all-ages event such as a wedding, you want both the sushi crowd and the brisket crowd to be happy with the food. And a bar or bat mitzvah crowd will be different again.

Azulay places great importance on choosing the menu. "Spend your good money on dishes that will be appreciated," she urges. "I hate to see good food go to waste."

For Azulay, personal events are the most interesting, because they're more of a challenge. At a wedding or bar mitzvah, the caterer is helping someone's dream become a reality.

And remember that kids can be tough.

"It's very hard to satisfy a young crowd," says Azulay. "Chicken fingers and fries bore kids. And while they're more interested in fun than food, you have to make them want to eat. They're more sophisticated than they used to be, too. Some even go for sushi."

If people like the food, Berk says, it gives strangers or distantly related people something to talk about. A buffet – perhaps with a station for each different kind of dish – means that people have to get up from their tables and mingle.

Although you should listen to expert advice, be clear in your mind what you want, and make sure your caterer knows it, Berk and Azulay advise.

The better a caterer understands your expectations, the better job they can do. Give them all the details of what you want to happen and when. The timing of the service has to mesh with everything else.

It's been said many times, and it's true, Berk insists: "Heaven is in the details."

Book a year or so ahead for a bar or bat mitzvah, Berk suggests, and about six to nine months ahead for a wedding. Menus change, so you won't want to finalize this until about three months before the event.

Azulay recommends looking at caterers as soon as you have a date. After that first meeting to establish a relationship, there should be a second to look at the menu, and a third when you're almost closing the deal, to try samples.

At the same time, because you'll always have more questions for your caterer, they should be available by phone, if not in person. And they should keep you informed of changes in menu, chef or other developments.

Unique touches can personalize your invitation

By JEN THOMPSON
Special to The CJN

Invitations have come a long way from being generic correspondence to promote a party and invite your guests. They can now set the tone for your event and offer an opportunity for your creativity and personality to shine through.

Ann Feldman of The Printed Word (416-484-4600) and Eric Aragon of The Aragon Group (416-597-0777; www.aragongroup.com) custom design their invitations to complement your event and your personality.

When choosing an invitation, Feldman and Aragon agree that it is helpful if customers come in with a sense of what they like and the message they want to project with their invitation. Both will then guide the clients through the myriad of colours, looks and textures to bring their invitations to life.

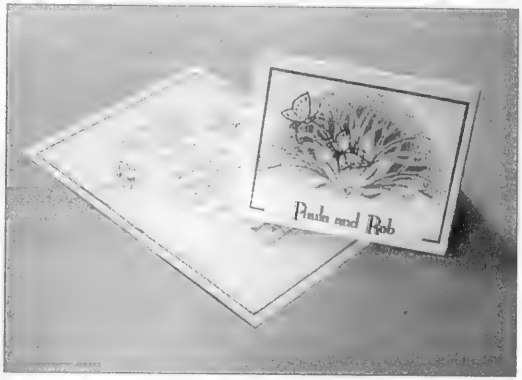
Shine and shimmer, specialty papers and Japanese designs continue to remain popular choices for invitations and colour is now one of the hottest trends.

Perhaps you have decided that you would like a green invitation. However, with so many shades, papers and tones, choosing the perfect one may become an overwhelming experience. Having a specialist is the key to getting exactly what you want. With over 30 years of experience, Feldman will guide you through your many choices to create your ideal invitation package. She says that even if something is not in the catalogue, it does not mean that it cannot be done.

Aragon says that "an invitation is important because it sets the flavour of what is to happen at your event." He gives this advice for you to consider when choosing your invitations: it is essential to convey the message clearly with the letters you choose. You should spend your time picking a beautiful stock and use a clean and classic font to set the feeling of the moment for your guests. Once you have chosen a good paper and the perfect font, add your personality to it.

When personalizing and creating unique invitations, Aragon encourages you to "step outside the box. We go beyond the traditional invitation." The sky is often the limit for his customers. Organza bags with beaded fringe and hand wax-sealed envelopes are some of the unique touches he has added to provide creative and excitement-inducing invitations.

Invitations are usually sent out eight weeks in advance of an event. Considering this, both Feldman and Aragon encourage customers to work backwards from their event when sending out invitations and plan as far in advance as possible. This allows for any changes that need to be made. It is not uncommon for customers to begin the process of choosing their invitations up to a year in advance of the simchah.



Feldman's invitation packages include the invitation and envelope and the reply card and envelope. She also offers a unique and accommodating service: she will address the envelopes for you if you supply a guest list by e-mail.

Aragon's traditional invitation packages also contain the invitation and envelope, the RSVP card and envelope, and a Shabbat card – a separate invitation to a Friday night (Shabbat) dinner or other meal. A map to the festivities is included for a slightly extra charge, and calligraphy is extra. Packages can start anywhere from $20, but Aragon works within his customers' budgets to ensure their needs are met.

From concept to reality, the Aragon Group brings to life creations that fit the client's needs. Classic design combined with a modern sense of reality creates distinctive cutting-edge concepts, the new breed of creative thought.

So when planning your next event, stop by one of these unique stores to choose the perfect, trend-setting invitation that will inspire anticipation of the festivities to come.

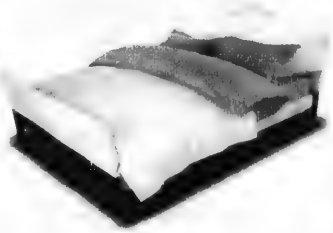
Elegant store offers luxurious linen

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to The CJN

David's Fine Linens, located in Bayview Village Shopping Centre (416-590-7311), is for the customer looking for a luxurious night's sleep.

"We specialize in fine, fine bedding," says David Saini, the store's owner. "Luxurious fabrics, silk-filled duvets, [products] from all over the world."



The store carries bedding made out of 100 per cent Egyptian cotton, imported from all over Europe, including Italy, and also Israel. It also carries washroom accessories, towels, tablecloths and pillows.

"All the linen for the home we can put together," says Saini. "From tablecloths to tea towels."

A couple looking to register at David's for their wedding will not only find a selection of high-quality products, but also in-house interior designers who can help customers choose colours for their bathroom or bedroom linens. Customers can expect to find help and support in choosing anything from table runners and placemats, to bed skirting and shower curtains.

And a recent partnership means that more selection is on the way. In September, Saini developed a partnership with Steven Back, formerly of Back Alley Streetware.

"We're a Hindu and Jew combined force," says Back.

The partners have known each other for 12 years as neighbours in the shopping centre. Back says he and Saini have been talking about a partnership for years, and he had been looking for an alternative to fashion.

"Fashion is a real grind," Back says. "A battle. Very cutthroat. It was time for me to take one road or another. [David's Fine Linens] is a better future for me. The relationship I've had with David is very prosperous. So far so good!"

Back is taking over day-to-day operations, as well as the wholesale part of the business. Saini operates two other linen shops in Toronto. Back is currently expanding one location, Linen Collection at Yonge and Steeles, to carry furniture such as beds, sofas and dinettes.

David's also carries furniture such as Wesley Allen fine wrought-iron beds (which start at $1,600-$1,800) and more moderately priced Fashion beds (starting at $300), for the couple looking for fine furniture as well as elegant linens.

Saini says that bridal registration has changed dramatically over the last 20 years.

"Twenty years ago, high-quality, luxurious fabrics were not around. There were only basic bed linens. It used to be that couples registered only for their table linens. We have a much wider selection now than we had before."

David's most popular item is the Egyptian cotton bedding. The cotton is woven to feel like a silk. The bedding, starting at $1,000 for a double-bed set, is machine washable and doesn't need to be ironed.

"It's easy lifestyle," Saini says. He also adds that many of the Egyptian cotton products carried in the store, such as sheets, duvet covers and pillows, come from Israel.

As well as linens and beds, David's also carries Tempur-Pedic Swedish mattresses, which Saini says have quickly become a popular seller.

The mattresses are made of materials originally designed for NASA, and mould to the body by using a pressure-release system. David's has mattresses on display in the store for customers to try out. Saini says they are so comfortable, some customers have been convinced on the spot.

"These [mattresses] change the way the world used to sleep," he says. "It's a totally different experience."

Other popular items for gift registry include Egyptian cotton towels, and silk-filled duvets from Austria. David's also carries high-end brand names such as Croscill, Keepsake and St. Geneve, as well as children's linen.

"The products we carry are very exclusive," says Saini. "A lot of what we bring in is exclusive to this store. Few other linen stores in all of Canada carry what we carry."

Creative décor and floral arrangements enhance any event

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Maybe you have a big bash planned but don't have the time or know-how to turn a drab hall or hockey rink into a palace fit for royalty. Or maybe you're looking to make guests feel as if they have been transported from a dreary November night to a white-sand beach or a lush tropical jungle. Fear not – Designing Trendz has the answer.

Floral designs by Designing Trendz (left), and Wysteria (right).

The award-winning décor company designs and prepares elegant, tasteful backdrops and decorations for events of all sizes, ranging from movie launches, charity balls and corporate launches to weddings and bar mitzvahs.

"Each event is custom made to the client's specifications," says company president Craig Gruzd. "We develop the theme with our clients."

Cutting-edge designs and original ideas are two of the company's hallmarks. For example, instead of traditional place cards for weddings or bar mitzvahs, Designing Trendz (416-665-6794) will etch guests' names onto material such as river rocks or glass containers. For those who prefer less traditional styles, an actor dressed in period costume will wear the cards pinned to her long, flowing skirt. (Note that this is a two-person job. One actor wears the dress, the other retrieves the cards.)

Beyond place cards and backdrops, Designing Trendz also specializes in floral arrangements, linens, ice sculptures, special effects lighting and live entertainers.

These original ideas have made the three-year-old company one of the leaders in its field, and Designing Trendz often helps set the industry standards when it comes to décor, says Gruzd. The company has a resume to prove it. Designing Trendz has done the décor for big-name stars, including the Star Wars movie launch and the Fashion Cares benefit. It also does product launches for companies like Honda Canada, corporate and charity fundraisers and holiday parties.

Most customers are looking for something non-traditional and glamarous.

Most of the customers who seek Designing Trendz's advice are looking for something non-traditional and glamorous, Gruzd says.

He recommends that customers visit him from six months to a year before the event's date, but can also throw together a fabulous event on short notice.

"We work through the night to make an event happen," he says.

Meanwhile, if you're looking for floral arrangements for a special occasion, head to Wisteria (905-763-1700). Located in Thornhill, Wisteria is a family owned business run by mom and daughter team Jacqueline and Debbie Headecker.

Young brides prefer cascading brocades to hand-tied bouquet arrangements

Jacqueline is a member of the American Institute of Flower Design, a prestigious florists' association, and has lectured on floral design in Japan, New Zealand and the United States, while Debbie has a background in graphic design and an eye for colour and style.

The duo can put together unique bouquets, flower arrangements and floral décor to suit any occasion, from weddings to bar mitzvahs to corporate functions.

"We don't use common flowers," says Debbie. Wisteria imports exotic flowers and foliages from places as distant as Australia and Hawaii, and combines them to create pieces that are a mix of traditional and contemporary styles. "Pretty with edge," she describes it.

One of the most important thing to keep in mind when considering flower arrangements for an event is the time of year, Debbie says. Greens and grasses work best in the cooler months. For fall, she recommends avoiding pinks. "Go more towards the jewel tones," she says.

Green and wine colours are popular for winter wedding bouquets and arrangements. "There's a larger selection of greens and grasses available in winter," she says.

Berries, cedar pine from British Columbia and cut flowers such as amaryllis, which comes in pretty pinks, reds, lime green, peach and white, combine for perfect winter weather arrangement.

Once spring returns, Wisteria uses lighter colours – pastel pinks and purples, lavenders and chartreuse greens – and flowers such as peonies, French tulips and orchids for arrangements.

Outdoor arrangement by Designing Trendz.

When choosing a bridal bouquet, it's also important to keep style in mind. Younger brides have been heading away from hand-tied bouquets and towards cascading brocades, while more mature brides prefer simple arrangements.

"Some people want exotic flowers, but others just want traditional hand-tied hydrangeas and roses," Debbie says.

Mandell Group re-invents the art of entertaining

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to the CJN

Planning a unique bar or bat mitzvah party may feel daunting to some. But Jared Florence, president of Mandell Entertainment Group (416-923-7200), says that's what his job is all about.

"The biggest thing we have been trying to do lately is reinventing the art of entertaining to make sure that each event is a unique experience."

Mandell Entertainment Group, one of the largest entertainment groups in Canada, offers customers a party-planning team able to organize any event from start to finish. But more importantly, Florence says, his staff is always looking to try something new to make their clients' events stand out from the rest.

Jared Florence

"People are looking for a difference," he says. "They're looking for non-cookie-cutter type of entertainment."

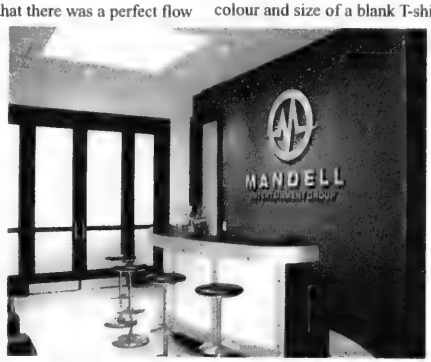
Florence refers to a recent bat mitzvah party he organized. The evening event was held at the Oakdale Country Club in Toronto. After working with the client for more than three years, Florence says he was able to come up with something dynamic and unique, "because a lot of the kids these days have got four invitations for one weekend."

This party was organized on an MTV theme. There was a video wall with images constantly changing. The stage was designed with Plexiglas tiers of different heights for dancers.

"They were filled with one to two dozen people throughout the evening," Florence says. "Kids and staff."

Ten staff members were at the event, including himself, dancers and technicians.

"It was a really great team in that there was a perfect flow for the evening," he says. "It was both a phenomenal party and a sleek event. Everything was done tastefully."



Not a cookie-cutter place for entertainment.

Florence notes that enthusiasm is an important ingredient in any event Mandell organizes. The entertainment group not only works on bar and bat mitzvah parties, but also weddings, corporate events and conferences. It offers clients use of two event theatres, York Event Theatre and Capital Event Theatre, both in the Yonge and Eglinton area. The entertainment group can also cater an entire event with Lobby, an exclusive bar and restaurant on Bloor Street.

For weddings, or those clients not looking to entertain using music DJs, Mandell offers the T Dot band, with vocalists, guitarists, drummers and sax players.

"That's been really popular over the past year," Florence says.

This summer, Mandell introduced the Mandell Roots Retro Summer Tour. The company visited Ontario summer camps and organized foam parties for the campers.

"We showed up with all the gear," says Florence. "Prizes, entertainers and a 40-by-40-foot pit of soap suds."

Campers enjoyed "clean" fun inside the pit, which Florence describes as like a "mini hockey arena," while Mandell offered the music and entertainment.

Other new ideas include novelty items, such as make-your-own T-shirts at bar and bat mitzvah parties. Guest choose the colour and size of a blank T-shirt. They can then have a graffiti artist paint on a design, or choose a retro screen-print. The shirts are available to take home right away from the event.

Another new activity being introduced this year is "photographed nail polish." Using a machine, guests choose the digital image they'd like. They then place their hands in the machine to have their nails painted with that image. Images can include photographs or digital designs.

Florence encourages prospective clients to visit the company website, www.mandellworld.com.

"This season is going to prove to open up a world of spectacular possibilities," Florence says. "We're going to make sure we're going to be doing things that haven't been done before. As we're going into our 13th season, we have new staff, new personalities, and new ideas. New ideas come every week."

New cookbooks focus on baking and Italian food

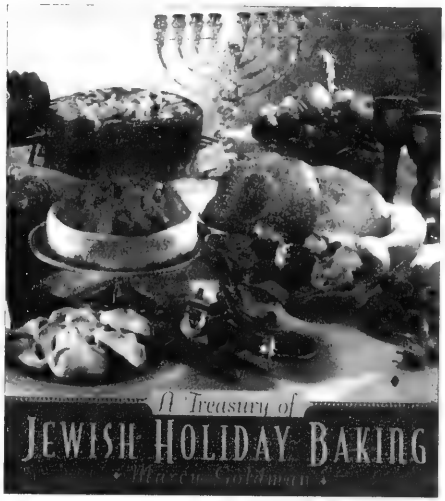
By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

There are few pleasures as tantalizing as the fragrance of fresh-baked bread, rolls and cakes.

Marcy Goldman, a Montreal writer and baker extraordinaire, has been conjuring up sweet aromas for years.

Her newly published book, A Treasury of Jewish Holiday Baking (Random House), appears just in time for Chanukah.

Goldman, whose articles have appeared in a variety of publications, ranging from the New York Times to The Canadian Jewish News, brings a barrelful of knowledge and enthusiasm to this useful and beautifully crafted compendium.



A sensible food writer, she takes nothing for granted.

The introductory chapter, which will appeal to seasoned and unseasoned bakers alike, lists the fundamentals – from how to measure flour to what kinds of yeasts to use.

Goldman also explains the importance of ingredients such as sour cream (a dream ingredient), yogurt (it adds a certain tang) and cottage cheese (it is not as rich as cream cheese, but it's wonderful in baking).

And because she is so thorough, she can hold forth on the wonders of additional ingredients like citrus zest, cocoa and chocolate.

Her recipes are largely original, and all have been tested. Best of all, they are easy to follow.

Goldman's Chanukah treats, from jelly doughnuts – a favourite in Israel – to dreidel cakes and honey bear rolypolys, will please virtually every palate.

Her recipes for the High Holy Days, from apple challah on Rosh Hashanah to sponge cake on Passover, hit the spot.

A Treasury of Jewish Holiday Baking belongs in every well-stocked kitchen.

Peruse and read it. It's a wise investment of your time.

When it comes to Italian cooking, there is no greater authority than Marcella Hazan, a Jewish chef whose master classes and books are world renowned.

In her latest work, Marcella Says... (HarperCollins), which follows on the heels of The Classic Italian Cookbook and Marcella's Italian Kitchen, Hazan offers readers essential tips and excellent recipes, almost all of which can be adapted for Jewish holidays.

She answers commonly asked questions concerning pasta, vegetables, meat and fish, writes about herbs and spices and recommends kitchenware.

With Marcella Says... at your beck and call, the fragrance of Italian cuisine is just a page or chapter away.

A caricaturist adds a 'magic mark' of uniqueness

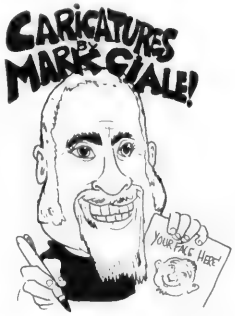
By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Ever think of hiring a caricaturist to make your special event unique? Here's what caricaturists Tim Hough (416-691-1931) and Mark Ciale (416-203-2514) have to say about their artform and why it's fun at a party.

Hough sees caricature as good-natured exaggeration. "It should please and amuse the subject," he says, "poking fun in a kindly way, without insulting."

He will make a long face longer, for example, or a high forehead higher.

There are some common caricature techniques. Often, for example, Hough gives the subject a big head with a little body. He frequently uses cartoon themes, such as a doctor wielding a big needle or a lawyer chasing an ambulance.



"Good-looking people with regular, even features," Hough says, "are the hardest to caricature."

He likes doing older people most, he says, because the lines in their face reflect their character, but generally, in his experience, it's kids that most like to be drawn.

Hough seldom does full-face drawings, doing profiles or three-quarter views instead. People prefer the three-quarter view. As well, it's more of a challenge and therefore more interesting for him as an artist. His ideal for caricature is the mildly satirical work of Mort Drucker in Mad magazine.

Tim Hough

Ciale does work that is light and fun, but portrait-like, making the person recognizable. He favours bold, deliberate strokes to express a great deal in as few lines as possible and draw an immediate response from the viewer.

At the same time, a good caricaturist is versatile, he says. Go to Ciale's website at http://members.rogers.com/markciale, and you'll see that he uses both finer and heavier lines to good effect. Ciale also has a vivid imagination and likes to put his subject in a scene or background.

When you choose a caricaturist, it's a good idea to pick one with sound professional training and varied practical experience.

Hough has a fine arts background. As a young child, he sat in the Royal Ontario Museum and drew dinosaurs. At 12, he began taking lessons at the Ontario College of Art (OCA), from which he later graduated with a degree in fine arts. You can see some of his artwork at www.timhough.com.

Hough has been doing caricatures for about 25 years, mainly at corporate events, but also at Ontario Place and the CNE, and at some weddings and other family affairs.

Ciale also studied fine art at OCA, and he's been doing caricatures for some 15 years at different events, especially bar and bat mitzvahs, although he works at any kind of party, from picnics to your year-end office bash.

Like most caricaturists, Ciale and Hough both work in Magic Marker. It's ideal for quick, fluid lines, but an expert hand can use it to produce a range of effects from rough and heavy to feather-light.

Each caricature takes Hough five to six minutes. He works for two to four hours at an event, doing about 10 to 12 people an hour. "At a party," he notes, "there is some pressure to perform."

Ciale does about 12 to 15 people in an hour, but he likes to schmooze a bit while he works. "And," he adds, "I can calm a bunch of rambunctious kids. They slow down to watch me, and become quieter."

Ciale also says his work can serve as an icebreaker that will put people at their ease. Strangers will cluster around the artist and find things to say to one another. This is especially important at a large affair where many of the guests don't know each other.

A caricature can be a permanent memento of an event, if treated well. "When you take it home," Hough urges, "don't fold or crease it. And get a photocopy. Then frame the original and put it under glass, both to protect it and make sure you'll treat it as something special, not just another piece of paper."

"A big caricature on illustration board," Ciale points out, "makes a fine corporate present or bar mitzvah signing board. This gives you a durable memento of the party." Keepsakes such as this, he says, give his work some permanence, and help him generate more business.

Ciale charges $75 an hour. He needs good light, a comfortable seat and water to sip. It can get hot under the bright light.

"Inquire early about a caricaturist," Ciale advises. "People book months ahead. And you'll want to allow some lead time before you book."

New venue accommodates every taste and party need

The new Paramount Conference and Event Venue.

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

Imagine a banquet hall combining the conveniences of modern technology with old-fashioned hospitality. Now picture a beautifully furnished venue where the décor and ambience can exceed your greatest dreams. If this sounds like a dream, it's not. You can find all this and more at the Paramount Conference and Event Venue.

The newly opened Paramount is part of the larger event planning group byPeterandPauls.com (905-326-4169), which for 22 years has created beautiful memories within the party industry with custom gift baskets, event planning, DJs and entertainment, venues, photography and catering services. Creative director Peter Eliopoulos says byPeterandPauls is like a "one-stop shop" for all party planning needs.

The venue lends itself to an array of decorating themes.

The Paramount boasts 61,000 square feet of party space with 25-foot ceilings and a lobby with a cascading staircase (great for photo-ops), built-in food stations and old-fashioned pizza ovens.

"The wood décor is elegant yet neutral," lending itself to an array of decorating themes, says Rebecca Gibbon, creative director for advertising.

A kosher kitchen is on the premises, with the talents of Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers available. Anything from traditional to international kosher cuisine can be ordered. To date, reports indicate that bar and bat mitzvahs and weddings that have taken place there have left guests – and their appetites – fully satisfied.

The versatility of the Paramount is in its ability to adapt to any given group, large or small. Anywhere from an intimate gathering of 15 to a large event for 1,650 guests can be arranged and there are five function rooms. Each function room has a separate entrance and private foyer for maximum privacy. There is also an underground service tunnel, so that wait staff can cross the length of the ballroom without intruding on guests. For relaxing in style there is a comfortable cigar lounge.

Flexible lighting possibilities can add drama and produce special effects. For instance, a guest's first impression when entering a hall may be enhanced by having lights beaming directly down on each centrepiece.

The Paramount also has a multi-level performance stage and a champagne fountain available. When the grand opening was celebrated in June, there was a ribbon cutting ceremony, and in keeping with all the extraordinary things about the Paramount, even this was something different. Cirque du Soleil performers descended from the ceiling suspended by red ribbons!

Large electronic screens can appear from the ceiling, while the professional on-site technicians support your presentation with flawless execution and built-in sound. VIP suites, valet parking and more than 600 complimentary ground level spots are available. Ideally located in Vaughan, it's only 15 minutes from Pearson International Airport.

All services offered are customized, and on-site event consultants are available to help co-ordinate the various pieces coming together to create the best event possible. The professional and creative management team handles event details with grace, class and efficiency.

With all that it has to offer, making the right choice and picking the Paramount for your next simchah is, well, paramount!

Deblins Linens 'will help make your house a home'

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

Deblins Linens is a store with more. More for your bed, bath and table – much more for your selection, time and money.

"Our selection, our service, our pricing, our quality are excellent," Deblins president Ellis Chitiz says. "Everybody says that, but it can't be true for everybody. We literally source household linens from all over the world to bring value and creativity to your home."

This approach to business has worked for them since 1977, earning Deblins Linens the Consumers' Choice Award for Business Excellence this year.

Chitiz knows linens. Growing up in South Africa, he would mind his parents' linen store when they were away. Deb's Linens, named for his mother, was a family-run business for 40 years, and a predecessor to Deblins Linens.

"If you cut my veins, linen flax will flow," Chitiz says kiddingly.

But jokes aside, the linen business really is in his blood, and he has brought Deblins Linens to the forefront in middle to high-end bath and bedroom accessories.

With no expensive overhead, no stores in malls, it is, notes Chitiz, "boutique quality at warehouse prices. All of our product is off-price. Nothing in our store is ever regular price, I work on a smaller margin."

Other stores' designer discounts are still higher than Deblins' regular prices, he says.

High thread-count sheets are brought in from Israel – for example, some of the Revelle linen line – as well as from Italy, the United States, Germany, India and China. Israel and Italy use top materials and finer cotton. Their finishing process often provides a sateen finish that's softer, shinier and smoother to the touch.

The Charlemagne line of linen is Deblins' own brand of manufactured or imported linens, made to their specifications and not available anywhere else. Deblins boasts 118 bedding designs, "more than anybody probably in Canada. We have an enormous selection. If you can't find bedding or linen in this store, you can't find it," Chitiz says.

Their duvets and pillows have high thread-count cotton ticking, preventing the down from escaping. They offer 16 different kinds of pillows and Canadian white goose down duvets, the best in the world. The natural insulation keeps warm air in and moisture out.

If customers can't find the tablecloth they want from its vast selection, Deblins can also custom order a specific size. This feature comes in handy, especially at seder time. Matching napkins, napkin rings and chair covers also help in setting a beautiful table.

Deblins computerized bridal registry is perfect for any new couple setting up a home. It's the perfect gift.

Deblins computerized bridal registry is perfect for any new couple setting up a home. Customers can go to any of Deblins three stores to make a selection. It's a perfect way to pick something both the bride and groom like, and even includes a free gift. It's also a great place to pick up the little extras one might give at a bridal shower – oven mitts, potholders, dishtowels.

"I'm very big on service. We have very good staff. They've been with us a long time," Chitiz says. His staff is knowledgeable and helpful in guiding customers, especially those new to home furnishings.

One room not to be overlooked is the bathroom. You can furnish a bathroom top to bottom, choosing from more than 200 shower curtains, hooks and liners. Rugs and high-end, beautiful bathroom scales and mirrors in wood or resin have your floors and walls covered. Some delicate touches are decorative perfume vials in clear, pink or gold and embossed towels for the powder room.

In a stroll around Deblins, you see splashes of tartan prints, vibrant solids, and bold, fresh, floral designs in vivid colours to brighten up the dark days of winter. Faux fur cozy throws that come in a variety of colours with matching cushions can ensure toasty, comfortable nights. Signs with the manufacturer's national flag are propped on display beds. Many of them bear the Israeli flag.

A trip to Deblins Linens is a step in the right direction to furnishing your home to suit your style and budget. As Chitiz says, "We will help make your house a home."

PARTY PLANNER

You'll have those moments to remember

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Every affair has precious memories that party hosts and their guests would like to keep forever.

That's why it's important to have a videographer to film and edit those moments, keeping the mood and authenticity intact, says Darren Sager of DMS Video Productions.

"It's a matter of capturing the right moments and highlighting those in the editing," says Sager.

Sager also emphasizes the need to hire videographers who put customer service first.

"I stress people above everything," he says. "It's all about the relationships you build."

Sager and fellow videographer Mark Beitel of Northern Memory Productions both believe the videography business is in the midst of a technological transition, as widescreen televisions and high definition DVDs make their respective marks.

"Right now, there are DVDs being released by Sony that are high definition… and that's the new wave of technology," says Beitel. "That's the highest quality you can get on DVD."

Widescreen televisions are also helping to elevate the quality of video productions.

"We've decided to be first to offer [DVDs] for widescreen televisions and so far, the feedback has been great,"says Sager.

"Customers are looking to keep their DVDs for years, and soon, every TV on the market will be a wide screen."

While the technology keeps becoming more involved, the trend in terms of style is to keep things fairly natural.

"My approach is straightforward," says Beitel. "I keep things natural."

For example, the horah and speeches will be shown in their entirety for the final package.

"I'll use the whole horah so it doesn't lose its appeal… but for regular dancing, I'll use clips and then fade into the next dance or sequence." he says.

"A lot of clients like that because I'm using the footage in the right way."

Sager employs a similar approach.

"We take a newscast approach… because we want the video to be timeless," Sager says. "It's about knowing and understanding the context."

Beitel and Sager agree that "recaps" – the blending of a series of special scenes into one fluid segment – have become a popular stylistic trend in videos.

"In a five-minute span, the recap can [capture] the whole evening," says Beitel. "I'll put some background music to it and sometimes add in black or white footage and it will fade away as [the couple] walks away, holding hands."

Sager says another hot trend is producing a video of the couple or bar or bat mitzvah prior to the event and then showing this "tribute video" to guests during the affair.

"For example, it could be footage that showcases the talent of the bar mitzvah or bat mitzvah girl," says Sager.

In business for 18 years, DMS has evolved into a full-scale team, with six full-time staff members and 12 part-time production assistants.

"We have a creative team mentality," he says. "We have many individuals who contribute to shooting and editing."

While having a team approach has worked well for DMS, Beitel has enjoyed success on a solo basis.

"I'm a one-man show… and I'm quite creative at putting the whole thing together," he says.

The "whole thing" Beitel is talking about is the editing of four to five hours of footage into a polished two-hour film.

Videographer Mark Beitel

Basic packages offered by videographer are usually the DVD and the video. But Beitel says more premium packages will offer clients the chance to keep raw, unedited footage.

Although weddings and bar or bat mitzvahs are their "bread and butter," Beitel and Sager both offer services for corporate affairs and other types of special events.

To reach Darren Sager, phone 905-470-4040 or visit DMS Video Productions online at www.dmsvideo.com.

Mark Beitel can be contacted at 905-881-0608 or 905 881 3734.

PARTY PLANNER

Security firm keeps your simchah safe

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

With hundreds of people at your party, you want the comfort of knowing that guests are safe and secure, says Ben Tabesh, an account executive with Condor Security.

"Parents can have their party with the peace of mind of knowing that we are there," says Tabesh.

"We are at synagogues around the city and we are the main company that the Jewish community looks for."

Tabesh says the demand for security services stems primarily from concerns about liability.

"If someone leaves [a party], who is responsible? That is a big liability and every parent is worried about it," Tabesh says."We take that liability off their minds."

Condor Security makes your guests feel secure at your party.

Condor Security provides specialized services, including everything from on-site security officers to access control systems, parking management and 24/7 emergency dispatch services.

"It's the integration of security services," says Tabesh.

Along with security for parties and special events, Condor caters to commercial, residential, industrial, corporate and institutional clients.

Tabesh says the company has also provided bodyguard services to Israeli politicians and performs jobs outside Canada in place such as South America.

Staffed with personnel who generally have military training, police training or both, Condor makes sure its employees are professionals who follow a strict code of conduct, Tabesh says.

"We're very particular in the people we hire," says Tabesh, noting that many staff members were trained in the Israeli or Russian armies.

"We look for clean-cut individuals who are career oriented."

While on-site officers perform various duties, most of their work at a bar mitzvah, for example, entails making sure that guests are orderly and remain on the premises and that there is no damage to property. They also monitor the site for suspicious people or objects.

"Our staff know how to deal with youth," Tabesh says.

"If there is an emergency, they know exactly how to protect kids."

Condor staff must participate in two weeks of field training before they start.

"This includes [training in] law, conduct, self defence/offence tactics, … such as different ways to hold a person down or how to put on handcuffs," Tabesh says, adding that employees also take a psychology test to learn to read body language.

In selecting a security provider, Tabesh encourages party hosts to do reference checks to ensure the security provider is experienced, as well as licensed, bonded and insured.

"This business is very specialized. If a company has a bad record, it spreads like wildfire," he says.

"We tell our clients that we want them to do research on us."

Condor has a reputation for its strictness, which Tabesh says is a good thing to look for in a security provider.

"You might have to wait longer to get into the synagogue, and [even if that] is an inconvenience, security is more important," he says.

Tabesh notes it is also important for security companies to have proactive staff who deal with security issues before they develop into problems.

"Vigilance is the key to security," he says.

"If there is a suspicious car, for example, we train our guys not to wait for the car to do something, but to approach it."

Tabesh says party hosts can either hire Condor directly, or in some cases, Condor has agreements whereby "the synagogue charges the client and we charge the synagogue."

The company is also affiliated with a number of party planners in Toronto.

While price is always a concern, Tabesh says safety should be paramount.

"Clients should realize that you get what you pay for," he says.

Condor Security can be reached at 416-410-4035 or toll free at 1-888-744-8738. You can also visit the company on the Web at www.condorsecurity.ca.

Hear a band play before you choose, bandleaders advise

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

How do you choose the band for your special event?

"Check out their website, but above all, hear them live," urges George St. Kitts, leader of the George St. Kitts Band (905-841-6489; www.georgestkitts.com). "Anyone can sound good on a two-minute demo."

Phil Gray of To The Moon Band (416-255-5730), concurs. "A club is a good venue to hear a band live," he says. "Get references too, but follow up on them."

Arrange for a showcase, hear their lead vocals and see if you develop rapport with the bandleader.

As St. Kitts points out, the main difference between a club and a wedding is atmosphere. The ultimate goal is the same: a good time. A wedding is more controlled and classy, a tuxedo event for all ages, not just the younger set. In other ways, a wedding is more laid back, mixing high-energy dance music with slower numbers, and using a playlist with wider range.

Gray and St. Kitts agree you should choose an experienced bandleader, and both place a high value on versatility. "The best wedding band," Gray says, "is one that plays gigs other than weddings."

Gray's formal studies have included music at Humber College in Toronto, and at the University of Miami. He plays piano, trombone and synthesizer, and has freelanced as a musician since 1975, teaching, arranging, working in film, playing in bands and touring Canada and the United States.

Gray has had his own band, To The Moon, since 1995. Clients range from Proctor & Gamble to the Canadian National Auto Show, from an Estonian wedding at Lake Placid, N.Y., to a Paul Martin fundraiser. Venues he has performed in have included synagogues and clubs.

St. Kitts is an established professional who has been written up in Billboard, with three CDs to his credit and his own record company, as well as club, casino, theatre and private party experience in Canada and the United States.

Valuable as experience is, St. Kitts loves to give up-and-coming musicians a chance: they give a gig their best effort because they want to succeed, he says.

Gray too thinks it important to hire fresh talent. Strong performers and good soloists, he believes, give a band much of its special flavour.

Both men advise choosing a band with high professional standards, musically and in working with other professionals. As an example, Gray cites bandleaders consulting with DJs to make sure they're covering different songs. "The client should supervise this directly," he says.

Choose a band with high standards, experts say

"Besides empathizing with the audience," says Gray, "you have to resonate with the music you're interpreting. We'll do things like playing computerized tracks while performing techno songs, to make a more authentic sound. We're not there to be original."

"The band has to be a star," says St. Kitts, whose views on this point differ from Gray's. His playlist may include some of his own energetic, upbeat, dance-able songs. "For much of the evening, the band is the centre of attention. If the guests cheer us, we know we're doing it right."

"Want to hear a piece?" St. Kitts asks. "I'll learn it for you." He loves to get people up dancing. He likes to interact with people, and not just on stage – he'd love to come over to your table and sing a song for you.

Both Gray and St. Kitts advise choosing a band with a wide repertory. Both are happy to do special requests, both find that learning new songs contributes to their growth as musicians and both bring a different playlist to each event. Both have Jewish music in their repertory too, and enjoy playing it.

"All good bands," Gray states, "should offer DJ service for breaks, if the client wants it." To The Moon Band also provides its own stage lighting.

St. Kitts and Gray also agree on the need to keep the energy level up at a party.

"The bandleader should feel out the crowd," says Gray; "he should play requests, and see what works."

As the energy level varies over the evening, St. Kitts observes, a good wedding bandleader makes the variations suit different phases (dinner, dancing, etc.). "Too much slow music makes people sleepy," he explains. "Too much fast music, and they get a bit frenzied."

Asked how he sustains his own energy during an evening, St. Kitts replies: "It's the music itself. I vary the tempo from fast to slow and back, have singers trade songs, or alternate male and female voices. There are lots of things I can do, and the guests like them."

Book as far ahead as you can, though. A good band is in high demand. St. Kitts already has some dates in 2006.

Ideas that make your party more fun for guests of all ages

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Long before the word "interactive" was invented, kids have known that doing is usually more fun than watching. And in every adult, no matter how sedate, there's a kid waiting for an excuse to party.

Hart Entertainment (416-762-2200; www.hartentertainment.com) puts the emphasis on interactive entertainment. Co-owner Philip Hart calls his company "Ontario's smartest party and event rental company."

Philip's brother David, then aged nine, read a book on magic and started performing for friends and relatives. Word spread. As he sharpened his skills, demand for his performances continued through his time at York University.

Later, when planning parties, organizers sought David's suggestions for a host of other fun ideas. Out of this beginning, co-owners Philip and David developed Hart Entertainment, which now, entering its third decade of business, does 1,200 events a year.

The events, for people of all ages, include family celebrations, holiday parties, school fun days, United Way fundraisers, sports promotions and media productions, as well as the gamut of corporate events, from year-end or holiday parties and picnics to seminars, team-building gatherings and trade shows.

Philip Hart offers some ideas about how to make your party more fun.

"Little things," he points out, "can make or break an event." So when you organize, pay close attention to details. Know your guests and what will turn them on.

"And get quality equipment," he adds. "It counts for a lot."

"Entertainers," Hart says, "set the tempo for the entire evening. A bar or bat mitzvah starts in the foyer, for example, so that's where the entertainment has to start."

A black jack table set up by Hart Entertainment.

And kids aren't into the drinks and hors d'oeuvres there – that's for adults. What the kids want is fun and games.

Hart sees kids going for some old-fashioned fun ideas like photo booths: you step inside and get four pictures taken. But adults, he says, love these pictures as much as the kids do.

Another thing kids can do, is create their own funny ID cards.

Other winners, in Hart's experience, are walkabout magicians. Everybody loves magic, but magicians mingling with a crowd infuse more energy into a party than if they're at a distance, high up on stage.

Games, Hart says, are always popular – basketball, air hockey and slot cars, to name a few – and Game Show Mania, which is something like Jeopardy. Games range from inflatables to arcade simulators. They also include casino games: roulette, blackjack, craps, crown and anchor, slot machines, even old-fashioned pinball machines.

Then there are sports. Hart Entertainment's repertory includes rock walls, miniature golf, obstacle courses, pitching cages and other games for the physically active.

Purim is another great time for a party, "a natural," as Hart calls it. Everyone likes to dress up in costume, everyone, child or adult, loves a carnival, and Hart Entertainment will organize a carnival for you.

A different fun idea you can try is the Money Machine. And no, it's not an ATM. You step into a see-through booth with a fan inside blowing money around. What you catch hold of and put in a box within 15 seconds, you keep.

Theme parties are another possibility. A Western theme, for example, might include a shooting gallery, a rodeo roper and a cow-milking contest.

Hart Entertainment also offers live entertainers. For example, you could feature a Marilyn Monroe look-alike singing Hebrew songs. They can also provide DJs, masters of ceremony, comedians and hypnotists.

Hart Entertainment can arrange anything from a single item to a whole party. They will also manage the logistics, whether you host your party at home or in a hall. They own and operate their equipment, which can be adapted to almost any location, and includes food carts.

The company will deliver equipment, set it up and operate many of the items, or come back to take it down at the end of your event. If you only require a drop-off, the staff covers equipment rules with you and makes sure everything is in order before your event starts.

Hart can provide a total turnkey set-up and supervision service to deliver, set up and stay at your event. Ensuring that your guests have a safe and wonderful time, this allows you to relax and enjoy the party.

"We're constantly on the search for new ideas and concepts," says Hart. "If you want something, please call us: we might just have it."

Mister Disc Jockey specializes in seamless entertainment

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to the CJN

A good party, like a good movie, has to have a strong beginning, middle and end.

That belief is what drives Mister Disc Jockey (1-877-473-3800), a company that has been providing interactive entertainment for bar and bat mitzvahs, weddings and corporate events for almost 20 years.

"We believe in seamless entertainment," says Ed McMurtry, creative director. "We understand that what happens in the beginning, impacts on the middle, which impacts on the end... Our job is to make sure that everything flows like a seamless thread throughout the evening."

Making that seamless thread happen means being creative, flexible and a good problem solver – all characteristics McMurtry says his company has become famous for.

"We have really been noted for taking the lead and co-ordinating. We're able to come up with creative designs," he says. "The key is listening to the client and getting them to describe the event in their own words."

McMurtry says he also believes in working with his surroundings. Recently, he did a bat mitzvah party at a converted downtown theatre. The design and architecture of the theatre is 1920s and '30s art deco. He wanted to come up with a theme for the party that would incorporate the feel of the location.

"But how do you take today's 13-year-old and tell her you're going to take her back to the 20s and 30s? Then I came up with the theme of her own dance club," he says.

The theatre was transformed into Ashley's Cotton Club for the event. Entertainment with Mister Disc Jockey is not limited to the dance floor. In this case, interactive entertaining meant that as soon as guests walked out of the elevator, they were greeted by "gangsters" playing cards and a "beat cop" trying to keep them under control. "Cigar and cigarette girls" distributed giveaways such as lip gloss, nail polish and chocolate cigars, and a "bellhop" handed out the tickets the guests needed to get to their tables.

"Already we're providing entertainment during the cocktail period while people are just trying to get to their seats," McMurtry says.

Once in the ballroom, guests followed a roped walkway that led them to the dance floor. There, six dancers performed an act from the hit movie Chicago, and handed out fedoras to the men and feather boas to the women.

"Now [the guests] are either participating or wondering what they should be doing," McMurtrysays.

Then, while being entertained by a singer who sings the song Roxie from the Chicago – only she uses the bat mitzvah girl's name instead – the dancers head to the stage where they perform a feather-fan dance. At the end of the dance, the fans are pulled back, and the bat mitzvah girl is revealed.

A great party from start to finish

"I like to call it shock entertainment. It's fun. We'll surprise the audience. I have a lot of families that will commission me to do innovative numbers they can't get anywhere else," McMurtry says.

Whereas bar and bat mitzvah parties are all about "high energy, high energy, high energy," Mister Disc Jockey is just as comfortable providing elegant entertainment in a fun and memorable way for weddings. And that is most evident in the details.

At a recent wedding, where the groom's family was from England, McMurtry made sure to use famous British songs, such as Rule Britannia, to introduce the speakers, including the groom.

"It wasn't about me coming up with a really cool track. The audience is now applauding and cheering," McMurtry says. "And when I kill the sound track, he has their undivided attention."

McMurtry has phone messages from thrilled clients who have called him from their honeymoons. His company has been called out to do events in Montreal, New York, Calgary, Vancouver and even Hawaii.

"There is a reason why people will fly us to Hawaii," McMurtry says. "There is a comfort level that they know their event is going to be outstanding because [we're] going to be there."

At the same time, McMurtry stresses that families do not have to spend large amounts of money on their entertainment for their events to be a success.

The Blues Brothers never looked so good.

"I think a lot of our clients are surprised at the quality of presentation they get from us for a moderate budget… I don't name-drop, or 'event-drop' to impress you. I talk about them to impress upon you our versatility. You don't have to be rich and famous to book us."

McMurtry's reputation has been recognized through awards and public speaking engagements. He often lectures at conferences on production and the art of seamless entertainment.

"I go to a convention and I can't walk across the floor without being stopped. You sort of pass [your knowledge] on to help the industry," he says.

His company, which also goes by the name Edwin Allen Productions, has won national awards through the International Special Events Society. But McMurtry says he's not out there to be 100 per cent better than the rest.

"I just try to be one per cent better. If you look at the two-per-cent solution in difference – Tiger Woods beats Mike Weir in two strokes. Tiger Woods gets $2 million. Weir gets $200,000… It's just that little nuance."

Mouth-watering desserts complete the special meal

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Few things are more memorable at a simchah than a sumptuous, mouth-watering meal. How about Mediterranean chicken with portobello and shitake mushrooms in a red wine and brandy sauce, served with a side of vegetables?

Beverly Hills Caterers, the exclusive caterer to Le Parc and Petah Tikvah Synagogue, specializes in preparing delicious feasts for bar mitzvahs and weddings that can be served in any COR-approved location. The meal options are varied, says owner Raphy Amar, and for introducing all-inclusive packages in banquet facilities, with Le Parc leading the way.

Customers should keep in mind a number of things when they consider catering an event, says Amar. The date, type of event, number of people and budget are four essential ingredients. Customers should also know whether they want a sit-down affair or a buffet-style meal. He recommends booking early, as some dates are reserved as much as three years in advance.

Amar's most recent project is a Glatt kosher steakhouse, called Gladstone's Bar and Grill, at Avenue Road and Eglinton Avenue.

Meanwhile, when it comes to dessert, how about a caramel brownie cheesecake, "topped with chunks of homemade chocolate brownie, smothered with buttery caramel," with melted Belgian chocolate and whipped cream on top? Or if you prefer, a chocolate lover's dream: a dessert with a chocolate cookie bottom, chocolate cheesecake middle, with dark chocolate mousse, chocolate ganache and chocolate mousse rosettes, decorated with chocolate curls?

Desserts from Beverly Hills Caterers.

Beverly Hills Caterers can whip up a multitude of cuisines, including continental, Chinese and Mediterranean.

"We can also do vegetarian dishes with any type of fish," says Amar.

As for dessert – the best part of the meal – Beverly Hills Catering (416-822-7056) has its own pastry chef who specializes in fancy French pastries, cookies and biscotti, says Amar, whose catering company takes credit

In the 1970s, Carole Ogus baked for family and friends, but she and her husband Michael soon turned her baking hobby into a booming business. It now exports Carole's cheesecakes around the world, to locations including Australia, Singapore, Hong Kong and the Caribbean. Starbucks coffee shops throughout eastern Canada and New England also stock Carole's cakes.

Carole's cheesecake fame extends as far south and west as Hollywood. Limousines have been known to stop by the west-end factory to pick up cakes on the run, and Liza Minelli and Celine Dion's managers have both bought cakes.

Carole's Cheesecake Company (416-256-0000) boasts more than 100 types of cheesecakes, plus other products such as cakes, tortes and pies, all handmade by an army of 30 people in a Toronto factory.

"We make hundreds and hundreds every day," says Carole.

"Hundreds and hundreds," chimes Michael.

One of Carole's favourite creations is her carrot cake.

"I brought carrot cake to the city of Toronto in the 1980s, when health food stores first opened – carrot cake with cream cheese icing and pecans, because they're sweeter than walnuts. People thought it was health food, but of course it wasn't," she says.

The company recently introduced a new line of cheesecakes. Advertised as guilt-free, the low-carb, gluten-free and sugar-free cakes will be available at Sobey's in the frozen foods section. Loblaw's also carries 25 Carole's Cheesecake products.

"I'm very serious about the quality of the product," says Carole.

Carole's Cheesecake Company will bake cakes for weddings and bar mitzvahs. Although it doesn't have a traditional layered wedding cake, cakes can be decorated with a bridal theme, says Carole. Carrot cakes and cakes of the chocolate variety are the most common for simchahs, she says.

Relax while the consultant looks after the details

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

We all want to enjoy our own party, and an experienced party planner can ensure that the hosts of a simchah will do just that, with minimal worry and reduced stress.

Toronto co-ordinator Carlie Wiener (647-296-0491) has helped many satisfied customers run a smooth, glitch-free party. Customers bubble with satisfaction when they speak of Wiener's commitment to excellence and attention to detail. There is also a consensus that she very personably works as though the event were her own, looking after things in a quiet, yet professional manner.

Wiener has been working as a part-time co-ordinator for about two years and is now starting to work at it full time. In a short time, she has managed to impress a lot of people, she says. "Because I'm young, I have a lot of fresh ideas that I can bring to the table. I really enjoy what I do."

She has worked on bar and bat mitzvahs, weddings, fashion shows at Beit Rayim Synagogue and fundraisers. "I like to work at fundraising in my free time," she says.

Wiener has taken the time to get to know others working in party circles. "The people in the industry are really accepting. There's enough business for everyone," she observes.

She helps party-givers with the finer details that are often overlooked. For example, you may forget a photo or a pen for the signing board, and she can pick one up at the last minute.

In addition to helping with the long-term planning, Wiener's services are available for the night of the function. This is a more economical alternative for those who can't afford a full-scale co-ordinator but want to relax the night of the party.

With input from the clients, Wiener prepares a schedule for the night of the party. Four to five hours before the event, she makes sure the set-up is right and table numbers are correct. She later ensures that speeches are on time and everything runs smoothly.

Carlie Wiener

When there's a budget, she uses her creativity and expertise to help clients do things themselves.

Another star party planner is Tamara Temes (905-770-7977; www.tamaratemes.com). Temes began doing this work after her own wedding, when she realized there was a great deal of room for improved service in this area.

"I've been doing bridal consulting for almost 10 years now," she says. "My whole premise for starting the business is I can identify with some of these people getting married because I'm not so far off from them."

With a background in public relations, which requires a lot of event planning, Temes has developed a unique way of approaching clients.

"I'm not a tyrant or a drill sergeant. I have a pleasant way of dealing with people and the job can still get done."

And the job gets done well, as evidenced by the many thanks and notes of gratitude she has received from clients.

Temes draws up a wedding itinerary after consultation with the clients. She sends this out to all vendors involved 10 days before the function. This helps to ensure fewer surprises.

When the unexpected does occur, she is always prepared. For instance, one time a bridesmaid ripped her dress just before the ceremony. Temes pinned the dress and tied the wrap over it so that the outfit was fine for the rest of the evening.

For a bar mitzvah boy or bat mitzvah girl, she can help develop their party themes based on their interests, hobbies and aspirations.

Like the diamond ring that symbolizes an engagement, Temes' work can be represented by 4 Cs. She is caring, compatible, committed and capable. She's also a good listener and very diplomatic. She once offered her own home as a location for a pre-wedding meeting because it was neutral ground in the face of quarrelling, divorced parties.

"Event planning is my passion. I'm fortunate to do something that I love," Temes enthuses. She's even been thanked in people's wedding speeches.

Creative themes add pizzazz to kids' birthday parties

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Co-ordinator

Once upon a time, the only food and props you needed to have a successful children's birthday bash were party sandwiches, birthday cake, ice cream, a jar filled with buttons or beans, chairs, records and the game "Pin the Tail on the Donkey."

The host would fill a jar with buttons, beans or whatever, and the child who guessed the total would win a prize.

And when it came time to play Pin the Tail on the Donkey, each child would take a turn being blindfolded and trying to pin the tail on a mule taped to a wall. Inevitably, the tail would land on another part of the animal's anatomy and draw giggles.

Then, chairs would be lined up and somebody would play piano or spin a record. As soon as the music stopped, the children would scramble for a seat, and anyone left standing would be out of the game. Ultimately, as seats are removed one at a time, one child would be left sitting and win a prize.

These simple home parties disappeared with typewriters.

Thanks to enlightening preschool programs and educational electronic games, today's children are more sophisticated, and they're hungry for new and exciting party ideas.

Below are some creative themes that parents have conjured up for the 21st century.

Fine arts and crafts: Regardless of age, children are mesmerized by working with clay, paints, fabric and other media. It also gives them something to show for their efforts and lets them share their accomplishments with party peers. Pottery boutiques, art studios and community centres that offer arts and craft activities have become popular party venues.

Baking: Shaping and cutting cookies, rolling dough, frosting and decorating cupcakes are lots of fun for the under-10 crowd. Some words of caution, though: make sure an adult supervises the use of the oven, and remember to keep the kitchen peanut-free to prevent nasty allergic reactions.

Magicians always have new tricks up their sleeves, and their sleight of hand never fails to amuse the young and young at heart. Jugglers and ventriloquists with trendy puppets are other talented individuals available for birthday parties.

Sports provide plenty of opportunity for children to have fun and burn off energy. Whether it's swimming, skating, bowling or just rollicking in a gym, local community centres, arenas and bowling alleys have experienced personnel and facilities to handle the job.

Dance parties – be they hip hop, rock or country – are a big draw with elementary school girls. And musical parties, where everyone gets a chance to perform, are growing in popularity with the success of American and Canadian Idol.

Videos and electronic games are other choices that never fail to amuse kids, though mom and dad should screen the films and examine the games ahead of time to make sure they are appropriate and in good taste.

Of course, if you're strapped for cash or short of ideas, you can always fill a jar with buttons or beans and invest in party sandwiches, cake and ice cream. The kids may find it refreshing, and your "retro" theme may prove the most creative of all.

Get more than you expect at the Four Seasons

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A party at Four Seasons Hotel Toronto (416-928-7302) is nothing less than over the top, says catering director Marc Dorfman.

"Everything we do for our guests exceeds what they expected. The quality of our food and our customer service is superior," he says.

Kosher functions are typically held in the hotel's Regency Ballroom – it accommodates more than 250 people – because it's adjacent to the kosher kitchen, says Dorfman.

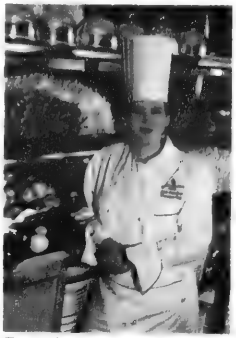
The ballroom, located on the second floor, covers 7,168 square feet and features 16-foot ceilings. Majestic chandeliers and wood panelling, both more than 100 years old, were installed as part of renovations in 1988. Special features include advanced sound and projection systems and remote control lighting.

"I have seen the room transformed after it was draped in organza. It's a big room, but it has an intimate yet rich feel," he says.

Functions are overseen by executive chef Lynn Crawford, says Dorfman, who will work with one of the four catering managers to customize menus to suit guests' needs.

The kosher kitchen, which has been in operation since 2000, can cater to groups from 250 to 500.

As demand increases for kosher events, says Dorfman, "Chef Crawford sources more and more international products. For an event last year she flew in kosher wasabi and pickled ginger from a supplier in New York.



Executive chef Lynn Crawford

"As we continuously source new suppliers to improve, upgrade and broaden our kosher menus, the response from guests is fantastic," he says.

Kosher hors d'oeuvres from the kitchen include Peking duck and lettuce wraps; the hotel's own house smoked salmon on rye toast; Arctic char on a celeriac and horseradish blini; and Asian vegetable dumplings.

Kosher dinners may include such items as five onion soup with chicken liver croutons; bundle of seasonal greens with marinated vine-ripened tomatoes and aged balsamic vinaigrette; pan-roasted Atlantic salmon fillet with fennel, artichoke and citrus emulsion; and roasted prime rib of veal with black mission fig and red wine sauce; and pommes dauphines.

Among the kosher desserts are roasted apple galette with almond paste and cinnamon sauce; dark chocolate mousse in phyllo nest; strawberry coulis; crème caramel with ginger marinated mango, papaya and banana; and frozen terrine of three sorbets: blood orange, mango and banana, and almond tuile.

A recent trend is toward comfort food, says Dorfman, and the hotel has had great success with its smashed potato bar, which includes mashed potatoes in martini glasses topped with a variety of condiments including herbs, basil oil, and deep fried onion crisps. Also popular are sweet potato fries in cones.

"Kids feel included with their own bar that offers blended drinks and themed cocktails," he says.

"Chef Crawford believes that attention to detail [should be] unparalleled when it comes to kosher cuisine. Innovation, creativity and an obsession with perfection are the key ingredients to sublime kosher food."

The set menu can be used a guideline, says Dorfman, "but the chef always thinks outside the box."

Samantha Geer, director of public relations for the hotel, says that with a 1 to 16 ratio of staff to guests, "guests can get almost individualized attention. Kosher events are truly luxurious affairs."

Four Seasons offers one-stop shopping for guests' party needs, Dorfman says. "Diane Murmota is our in-house florist, and we can put guests in contact with a number of décor companies.

"We can also work with individuals with respect to their budget."

The Four Seasons offers service from beginning to end, he says. "The same person you spoke to when you began planning your party will be at your party to see it through."

Dead Sea spas can help you heal and relax

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Israel's Dead Sea is the lowest place on earth at 400 metres below sea level. The climate, sun, water, air and mineral rich mud attract health and wellness lovers from all over the world.

And from there, you can head further south to exotic Eilat on the shores of the Red Sea overlooking Aqaba in Jordan.

You could spend weeks, even months checking out all the spas in the Dead Sea area and in fact, many people, especially Europeans, do.

It might, however, be harder to find a spa-resort that carries one of the more than 80 local, mineral-based product lines instead of European brands that are available everywhere. Two spas that do are the Spa Hamaayan at the Hod Hamidbar Hotel and the Crowne Plaza Dead Sea Spa, both located in Ein Bokek.

The Spa Hamaayan is a warm, inviting spa with 12 treatment rooms and 20 therapists from Israel and Russia. Many of the therapists have limited English, but they speak with their hands with ministering, nurturing treatments such as Mother Earth, a natural mineral mud treatment; Sea Treasure, a mineral mud treatment enriched with seaweed; and Oil of Myrrh, a mineral mud treatment enriched with aloe vera.

Other Spa Hamaayan treatments include facials, massages, Thalassotherapy, manicures, pedicures and barbering. The therapists use Mineral Care products manufactured in the area. The facilities include a Dead Sea-filled indoor pool heated to 37 degrees Celsius, a sulphur pool, a Jacuzzi and a dry Finnish sauna.

"The sun in the Dead Sea is filtered, so you don't burn as dangerously as in other places," says Mario Grutzner, Hamaayan's spa and guest relations manager. "Because we are 400 metres below sea level, the body absorbs about 40 per cent more oxygen than in any other place in the world. This is very good for relaxing and for people with asthma or cystic fibrosis. The Dead Sea waters contain bromide. [The water] vaporizes because of the heat, causing smog in the air, and the bromide and other elements are good to calm down nerves and create a relaxed atmosphere.

"We also have the mud of the Dead Sea, which has been famous for beauty treatments since ancient times."

The Crowne Plaza Dead Sea Spa offers a wide array of treatments in its modern facility including mineral mud wraps and body scrub peeling with aroma of coconut/vanilla or lavender/lemon. Their many massages include the integrated massage that combines shiatsu, reflexology and Swedish techniques. In addition to the facials for women, men can partake in a Julius Caesar facial that includes a scrub, deep cleaning, facial massage and mask.

This spa has 20 therapists from Israel and Russia working out of 20 airy treatment rooms, along with a Jacuzzi, wet and dry sauna, pressure shower, sulphur pool and gym.

Just over two hours from the Dead Sea in Eilat lies heaven on earth – a three-level, six-star spa at the Herods Vitalis Health & Lifestyle Resort, a boutique property, part of The Luxury Collection of Sheraton Hotels and Resorts.

"We have 10 massage rooms and four facial rooms, our therapists are all Israelis, our product lines are from Europe, Yon-ka and Phytomer," says Dorit Haron, manager of Herod Vitalis Spa. "Our signature treatments include Black Magic mud treatments on the Vitalis treatment roof, the Alpha Vital facial, hot stones and Ayur-Veda, using two or four hands, an Indian massage that is very popular with our French guests. We have a sauna, a pool where we offer aqua gym, a cascading water pool and a Jacuzzi, where we can do massages."

El Al Israel Airlines' Boeing 767s fly directly from Toronto to Tel Aviv, Sunday to Thursday – the Dead Sea is just over two hours from Ben Gurion Airport, and there are connecting flights to Eilat. For airline information call EL AL's Toronto office at 416-967-4222 or go online at 222.elal.com.

For more information about Israeli spa vacations contact Israel Government Tourist Office Canada, call 416-964-3784 or online at: www.igto.ca.

Kathryn Kates' trip was sponsored by the Dead Sea Hotel Association; the Dead Sea Regional Councils - Tamar and Megilot; Israel Ministry of Tourism and EL AL Israel Airlines.

Gift of jewelry is always a good choice

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

If you've been invited to a wedding or other occasion, you'll be thinking about choosing a gift.

For lasting value, Dalia Lash of Mark Lash Designs Fine Jewelry (416-256-5229) and Lilliane Moses of Lilliane's Fine Jewellery (416-920-7676) suggest that you consider jewelry.

Jewelry transforms material wealth into something of spiritual value, they say. It may be costly, but it's a lasting memento of an important milestone in a recipient's life, so it's important to choose such a gift with great care.

Adults often wear jewelry they received at their bar or bat mitzvah, Moses says. And Jewelry, adds Lash, often outlives both the giver and the recipient, as a beloved brooch or ring is passed down through generations.

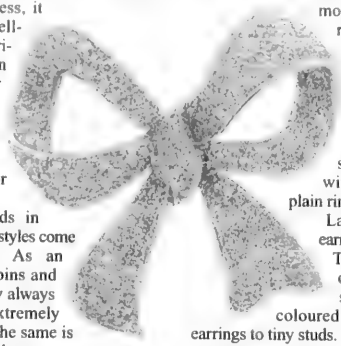
In Moses' experience, jewelry makes a popular bar or bat mitzvah gift.

"Girls tend to like pendants, necklaces and earrings in pretty designs, while boys usually like watches, bracelets, and initial or signet rings." (An initial ring is engraved; a signet ring is carved or cast in a precious metal.)

When we think of precious metals, gold and silver probably come to mind first, then platinum. But copper is also precious, Moses points out.

As well, many alloys are used to harden gold, which by itself is quite soft. Pink gold is a gold-copper alloy, while white gold is an alloy of gold and silver or nickel.

Another precious metal is titanium, Moses says, although because of its combination of strength and lightness, it may be more well-known for its industrial uses (e.g. in aircraft). It's harder than gold, silver or copper, and its silvery colour with a natural matte finish makes it popular for wedding bands.



"There are trends in jewelry style, but old styles come back," Lash says. As an example, she cites pins and brooches: while they always sell well, they're extremely popular right now. The same is true of pearls, she adds.

When people want a long-lasting piece of jewelry, says Moses, they think of a more traditional, classic look. As with clothing, simple elegance is timeless, and diamonds still have the most staying power.

Lash knows plenty of ways to make an older piece look more "trendy."

Clasps or diamond pieces can be added to pearl necklaces, while coloured stones can be added to pearl earrings. A briolette – a teardrop shape with facets – can be added to a diamond stud or pearl earring to make it more festive, then later removed.

Lash has also noticed that pavé – a method of setting small diamonds close together – is popular, because it has a lot of sparkle and can be started with one diamond on a plain ring, then added to.

Lash also recommends earrings as a great party gift. They can be flamboyant or unobtrusive, with styles ranging from large, coloured baubles or chandelier earrings to tiny studs.

South Sea pearls are also very popular, Moses notes. They come in many colours, but the white ones, which are currently the most popular, are also the most expensive and the most rare.

Semi-precious stones also come in many colours, says Moses. Sapphires may be pink, yellow or green, for example. Less well-known are peridots, which are olive green, and citrines, which are a form of yellow quartz.

Of course, you have to consider what garments a piece will be worn with.

"Pearls show strongly against deep colour," Lash notes. "People are wearing 50s-style pins with sweaters, dresses and blazers, and a pin looks good closing a fur stole, wrap or scarf."

Choose a jeweller who does custom work, Lash advises. You want someone who will not only sell you a piece, but repair, refurbish, redesign and update it – though, of course, if you have a piece that's 150 years old, you wouldn't want to change its look.

If you want something designed from scratch, she advises ordering it four to six weeks ahead of time.

So, besides anniversaries, birthdays, weddings, and bar or bat mitzvahs, when else does jewelry make an appropriate gift?

Asked if she thinks the birth of a baby should be a festive day for the mother too – perhaps an occasion for a new dad to buy his wife a piece of jewelry – Moses has a ready answer:

"You won't find any woman disagreeing with that."

Out of party ideas? Try laser tag or dancing

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

So you're planning your son's 11th birthday party and you're not keen on having 15 or 20 of his closest friends stampeding through your house.

Fortunately, Pin the Tail on the Donkey is passé and there are plenty of great party venues to choose from.

One place you might consider is Laser Adventure (905-707-7137), located at 5 Glen Cameron Rd., off Yonge Street one block north of Steeles Avenue in Thornhill.

Moe Abdo is manager and co-owner of this entertainment centre, which opened nine months ago. He says Laser Adventure "offers a great time for children of all ages, and adults too."

He says parents really like the venue. "It's a very clean environment, and the décor with its Star Wars theme appeals to the kids and adults as well."

While Laser Adventure is brand new, Abdo is not new to the party business. He has co-owned two other laser tag centres for more than eight years.

This experience has paid off. Recently, the centre was voted the best birthday party place in Thornhill by a local newspaper. "That warms my heart. After all the renovation and hard work, it's great that we're being recognized by the community," Abdo says.

One appealing feature about Laser Adventure's arcade is that children collect tickets for prizes. "We're one of the only laser centres that offers redemption games," says Abdo. "The kids win tickets playing the video games and cash them in for prizes.

"That always adds extra excitement. There is always a prize for everybody. Every child wins something and they leave feeling terrific."

Laser Adventure boasts a large multi-level arena that is about 4,500 square feet in size. "The multiple levels make the game really exciting," says Abdo.

He stresses that the arena is enclosed and is supervised by staff at all times. For parties of 20 people or more, he offers exclusive use of the arena for the laser tag portion of the party.

To use the party rooms, he requires a minimum of eight children.

He says part of the fun is checking the score sheets. "At the end of each game, the players get a printout which tells them in detail the outcome of the games. It tells them which team won and the score of the individual players.

Kids just wanna' have fun

"The kids love to compare their scores. If they're getting two games, they like to improve their scores."

Parents should allow one hour and 45 minutes for a two-game party.

There are a number of party packages. "People have the option to bring their own food. We allow it. We have packages to accommodate all budgets and tastes," Abdo says.

"In the near future, we are planning to introduce a new package which includes kosher pizza and kosher cake. This way, it will be a worry-free party for the parents."

Laser Adventure is currently running a special promotion: 80 free tokens will be added to party packages booked before Dec. 31. "It doesn't matter when they hold the party. They get 80 free tokens, which is worth $30," Abdo says.

Right now, corporate and community groups are booking parties for the holidays says Abdo, noting that Laser Adventure, which is open to the public for non-party entertainment, can make the venue available for parties outside regular business hours.

"This is the ideal place for a party. Kids just have so much fun."

Keri Saltzman of Keri's Dancin' Kids (905-731-5146) offers a totally different kind of children's party.

Saltzman, who specializes in dance and communications, has been running dance and interactive parties for children for six years.

"The primary focus is on dance," she says. "We offer different packages, which can also include arts and craft, creative movement and co-operative games for both boys and girls."

The parties can take place at people's homes or at outside venues, she says.

The parties are customized for each child, she explains. "The most important element of our service is that we actually cater to the individual child. Every child is different. Therefore every group is unique and every party is unique.

"I have had families where I've done four or five birthdays. People call me back. They know the new party will be different. I am constantly updating the music and dances and different components of the parties."

Saltzman's own background is perfectly suited to her interactive parties. She has been dancing – performing ballet, hip-hop and tap – for 15 years. "I had a lot of opportunities to perform in professional shows and do interactive entertainment. I also did competitive dancing all over Canada and the U.S."

She also teaches dance in studios in Thornhill and Woodbridge.

A recent graduate of York University, Saltzman has a degree in communications studies. "It allowed me to learn and grow in many ways," she says.

She also has extensive experience running children's programs as a dance specialist and arts co-ordinator at various local camps.

She says all her staff are at least 18 years old and are mature enough to work with children. "The staff come from the places I teach, or they are people I dance with. I look for high-energy, interactive people who are mature and outgoing.

"They need know how to have fun with kids and to be responsible. They're there to find out who these kids are and how to make the party most memorable. We brainstorm to come up with customized parties."

Saltzman also offers after-school and lunch programs.

A typical party lasts 2 hours and 15 minutes, but 1-hour packages are also available.

The longer packages start with a 45-minute to one-hour interactive dance time. There is a break in the middle for refreshments before the second activity, which could be karaoke, nail art, arts and crafts, or a co-operative game.

Saltzman does more and more parties for boys. "Dance has become gender neutral," she says. "Whether it's hip hop or break dancing, I'm finding more boys are interested in dance classes."

She also runs an adult division called Energized Entertainment for corporate and private parties. She has done events for camps, community centres and Jewish communal groups.

Keri's Dancin' Kids' birthday parties are generally geared to children aged two to 12, says Saltzman. "Our motto is 'Energize the party.' We cater to the kids and that pleases the parents."

Saltzman can also be contacted by e-mail at keri_saltzman@rogers.com

Perfect shoes to enhance your event

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

While dancing the night away at the next wedding or bar or bat mitzvah, wearing beautiful shoes can add to your perfect night.

Yet, at times, the search for comfortable and stylish shoes can seem like a never-ending scavenger hunt. To help you in your search, try two of the better shops in town.

Walter Steiger Shoes, at 38 Avenue Rd., is one of 30 international boutiques, with other locations in New York, Paris and Milan. The store, which opened here three years ago, is the only one in Canada. It carries an exclusive selection of Swiss-made shoes and a wide variety of footwear, ranging from high-heeled boots to men's dress shoes. The store also features a collection of stylish handbags.

In addition, Walter Steiger has acquired many celebrity fans in its 40 years in business. Such stars as Jackie Kennedy-Onassis, Princess Diana, Tina Turner and Bette Midler have worn shoes by the designer.

One of the defining features of the shoes is their incredible fit. "The shoes fit like a god," says Izabela Kosmowska, the company's Toronto representative. The Steiger fit differs from that of other shoes because they are comfortable yet look sophisticated and beautiful.

Another defining feature of Steiger shoes is their vibrant and luscious colours. "Nobody carries colours like us," Kosmowska says. The shoes come in anything from a ruby red evening shoe to a sheepskin boot in chocolate brown. Kosmowska cites pumpkin and purple among this season's hottest and most popular colours.

When you wear Walter Steiger designs, your shoes will stand out. Since the store offers a wide but exclusive selection, you can be sure that not everyone will be wearing the same shoes as you.

Another fantastic choice is Celebration Shoes, at 106 Yorkville Ave. For the past 11 years, Celebration has been offering a wide selection of decorated shoes that are dyed to match any dress or garment. Concentrating mostly on bridal shoes, Celebration customizes shoes using materials as diverse as Swarovski crystals or freshwater pearls.

With her specialty fabrics and dyes, Celebration's Carma Saunderson "creates a fantasy for any woman who has a special occasion."

To make this fantasy a reality, Saunderson works closely with designers and customers to achieve the best results possible. Celebration will spend hours on a single dye in order to create the exact colour needed.

Saunderson even networks with other bridal stores to make sure that every customer looks absolutely perfect. "It's a passion for me to send my customers to other great stores," she says.

In addition to their customized services, Celebration exclusively carries such British shoe lines as London Sole, a new line that, Saunderson says, is "taking Europe by storm."

The line features ballet flats in fabulous colours, patterns and textures. The shoes, which start at $140, come in anything from "platine-gold" to faux fur with leopard print. Celebrity fans such as Nicole Kidman, Goldie Hawn and Kirsten Dunst have chosen to wear these comfortable, beautiful shoes.

Saunderson owes her success to her unique service. "To be successful at anything, you have to concentrate on it. Trends are fleeting, but a beautiful shoe is always in style."

Although Celebration deals mainly with bridal shoes, its service has become invaluable to customers. "Since we can really incorporate anything to help bring the feeling of the occasion to the shoes and accessories, we are beginning to see a lot of repeat customers who will come in a few years later to create fantasies for their children."

Since the right shoes are the base of an incredible outfit, it only makes sense that you don't stop looking until you have found the perfect ones. With the help of Walter Steiger and Celebration shoes, you needn't look any further.

Party-suppliers offer variety and convenience that add to the fun

By JEN THOMPSON
Special to The CJN

Have a blast while planning your parties this year. Ken Gutman and Stewart Robinson of Dynamite Party and Novelty Supplies (905-669-7620) and Jack Schnoll of Kosher N' - Natural Foods (416-789-7173) provide everything you want to make your celebration a success.

Dynamite Party & Novelty Supplies caters to kids of all ages.

The major advantage of one-stop party suppliers is the convenience of being able to find all your party needs under one roof. When you plan a simchah, the "to do" list is often longer than the guest list. Choosing from the many possible themes, colours, giveaways, food and decorations can be a stressful experience for even the most experienced party planner. However, both Dynamite Party & Novelty Supplies and Kosher N' Natural can ease the stress by providing friendly, interactive service to meet your every need.

When choosing a one-stop party supplier, it is important to find a shop that you feel comfortable with. Its flexibility is the key to helping you achieve your goals. A good supplier should work with you and adapt to your schedule, budget and ideas. Both of these Toronto-area stores have the expertise and service to be effective one-stop party suppliers.

Ken Gutman welcomes you to come in and scour the newest and coolest items on the market. Armed with a "director of fun" to assist them, customers will be able to find everything for their party. With a large inventory of products and services, Gutman promises that if they don't have it, they will find it for you.

Specializing in party supplies and giveaways such as hats, stuffed animals, flags, licensed sports and cartoon memorabilia, Dynamite Party & Novelty caters to kids of all ages. They will also supply personalized bracelets and key chains for your event to create unique memories for your guests.

Kosher N' Natural has been providing friendly, flexible service in Toronto for 23 years.

Known as the "candy man," Jack Schnoll provides an all-kosher store in which customers can browse through a large selection of delectable, colourful and unique party and gift supplies.

And in addition to being able to provide your partygoers with an overwhelming supply of kosher treats, balloons, candy machines and decorations, Kosher N' Natural also supply simchah gift baskets for your upcoming events.

When asked what makes them unique, both Schnoll and Gutman say it is how accommodating they are to their customers. A customer can come in with only a small idea and these shops will be able to expand on it with unique and interesting party suggestions.

One example of a service Dynamite Party & Novelty Supplies offers is a Create a Bear activity for bar and bat mitzvahs in which party goers receive customized, stuffed, newborn bears for the occasion noting the date of the event.

Saving time and money are often considerations when planning a party. Schnoll and Gutman offer a wide price range of goods and services that will suit anyone's needs. They will work within your budget to fulfil all your party requirements.

Gutman goes further to say that Dynamite Party & Novelty Supplies offers novelty items for as little as a dollar.

Both are conveniently located in the Greater Toronto Area and offer delivery to your event.

Dynamite Party & Novelty Supplies and Kosher N' Natural emphasize that planning a party should be an enjoyable experience. Parties offer the opportunity to provide joyous memories for your guests. A visit to a one-stop party shop should do the same for you.

Other one-stop party places advertising in this supplement are: Dominion Smallwares, 416-665-9526; Incredible Novelties Inc., 905-881-9900.

Woodbridge party venues up the 'wow' factor

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When Sherri Wolfish was looking for a venue her son Max's bar mitzvah, her party planner recommended Match Restaurant and Event Venue (905-850-5699).

"My planner said she was having her son's bar mitzvah there. She said, 'If you can get it, take it. Trust me, you won't be disappointed,'" says Wolfish. "I took it sight unseen. I eventually made my way up there in the summer, and I found the venue to be perfect for my needs.

"I was looking for a room to accommodate a kid- and adult-friendly party. My son Max really wanted a dance party. He's the type of guy who enjoys being the life of the party. He has lots of friends... who are equally as animated and who no doubt will be partying right along with him. I'm sure that Max will be very happy with Match."

Wolfish says she loved the party room and was pleased because it doesn't require a lot of decoration.

Scott McAllister, Match's event co-ordinator agrees. "Other than centrepieces, decorations are not required, because the room has such nice décor. It's definitely not a plain room."

He says the "elegant and funky" room has a mustard- and burgundy-coloured finishes that go with any party theme. "The drapery on the ceiling adds warmth to the room. And the huge tulip-shaped chandeliers are very funky."

The Match Restaurant and Event Venue, located at 177 Whitmore Rd. in Woodbridge, just south of Highway 7, two blocks west of Weston Road, is a 15,0000-square-foot restaurant and private facility that can accommodate parties of between 20 and 200 people.

It offers children and adult menus with buffet or sit-down style dinners, or a combination of both.

Its three party rooms all have roomy dance floors, so there's no need to move tables aside after dinner.

Up the 'wow' factor at party venues in Woodbridge

McAllister praised the work of chef Domenic Chiaromonte, who can prepare "amazing kosher-style meals. The food is incredible."

Match hosts a lot of corporate parties, bar and bat mitzvahs and weddings, McAllister says.

"Our clients say that the parties exceed their highest expectations. They say the service is outstanding. The presentation blows them away."

Another Woodbridge venue to consider is the Royalton Banquet and Convention Centre (905-851-2325), at 8201 Weston Rd. just north of Highway 7.

"The Royalton is known for its elegance and its outstanding kosher cuisine," says president Robert Marra. "We can seat 800-plus. We've done weddings that big. We also do corporate and community organization events, and they can be very large."

Marra has been in the banquet hall business for some 20 years and has had extensive experience running private and corporate parties, he says.

The Royalton has been operating for 10 years and has been under kosher supervision for the last five.

It has three rooms that can accommodate parties of different sizes. Marra requires a minimum of 75 to 80 people for a simchah or party.

The Royalton offers packages that include venue, food and liquor.

For bar and bat mitzvahs, children are half price, he says. "We can do a special kids' menu. They usually choose chicken fingers and fries or pasta."

And you- certainly won't have to worry about guests going home hungry. The food component of the package includes hors d'oeuvres, appetizer, salad, main course, dessert and sweet table.

The hors d'oeuvres are generally served in the large foyer. For weddings, the entire venue is reserved exclusively for that party, so the whole event can be very private, says Marra.

He describes the Royalton décor as very elegant. "The ceilings are high. We have gorgeous chandeliers. It's so elegant you don't need any decoration except for the centrepieces.

"People bring their own flowers, we can provide a large assortment of chair covers and tablecloth colours to go with any party theme."

The rooms have dance floors, so people can get up and dance between courses, he adds.

And what do clients say about the Royalton?

"They love our food," says Marra. "They say our food is excellent. We have our own chef in the kosher kitchen. Everything he does is great.

"We get a lot of business through word of mouth, particularly for weddings. When our clients come to pay, they always offer to be references because they're so happy with how the event turned out."

Wedding Planner serves as neat organizational tool

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Co-ordinator

Most of us have been guilty of this at one time or other. And some of us never quit. No, I'm not talking about smoking or snacking on sugar-filled treats. The habit I'm referring to won't make you ill, but it sure will waste time and cause anxiety. It's jotting notes on scraps of paper that invariably go astray.

However, if a bride has a good wedding planner, she will be able to see what needs to be done and check off completed tasks. Then, after the wedding, she will have a record of her prenuptial parties, guest lists, gifts, purchases and more.

Sheryl Paul, author of The Conscious Bride, has scored another winner with The Conscious Bride's Wedding Planner. Distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada, this sturdy, hard-covered text documents everything from the practical and emotional aspects of the wedding to honeymoon travels and post-nuptial issues. Paul, a professional bridal counsellor, practises in Los Angeles. Her business is called Conscious Weddings.

On page 13, she suggests how to get good value out of the planner. Write in it, earmark it, carry it with you, underline and highlight whatever you want, but keep it handy, she advises. The book includes templates for seating plans, guest lists, calendars, gift lists and more.

But the Conscious Bride's Wedding Planner is more than a comprehensive journal and guide. The author also suggests good books, videos and movies about weddings. In addition, the text is enriched with anecdotes and advice about letting go of old loves, dealing with relatives and singlehood. As Paul points out, wedding preparations involve more than arranging for wedding invitations, although these are important. She believes a couple must prepare emotionally, practically and spiritually for the biggest milestone in life. Whereas most guides help brides choose their clothes and service people, few broach the subject of a bride's feelings. "The more time spent sorting through your inner world, the more serenity you will attain," Paul advises.

She relates the story of "Kaitlyn," who froze every time she started writing out her wedding list. After awhile, Kaitlyn recognized an emotional barrier and sought help to combat it. (Out of respect for her interviewees' privacy, Paul refers only to first names throughout the book.)

Paul designed a series of exercises to help people like Kaitlyn work out solutions. It's only natural to experience these feelings of anxiety, Paul says. Part of the rite of passage involves giving up your way of life to enter a new phase.

In Chapter 9, the author discusses the "I within the We." Invariably, both mates want to maintain a certain amount of independence despite the close union. "The emotional tasks of the first year do not occur in a linear fashion," the author says, noting marriage is a continual process.

Paul did her homework and provides worthwhile wedding-day tips. She interviewed "conscious brides" with whom she had worked and asked them to share tips on how they stayed grounded on the big day.

Here is what one bride said: "Jake and I wanted to honor the Jewish tradition of yichud [union], which is a brief respite after the ceremony where the bride and groom take about 10 to 15 minutes to connect," Eleanor said. "This was a real grounding point for us. It was our way of acknowledging that this wedding day was about and for us.

"We went into a private room and let the magic and depth of what just transpired in the ceremony sink in. This was our first moment as husband and wife. We held each other, kissed, ate a little and breathed. And then we felt ready to greet our guests and join in the community celebration of our union. I look back at those few minutes as some of the most profound and spiritual of our day."

PARTY PLANNER

Beauty care can ease pre-party stress

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

A little TLC and some knowledgeable beauty care can go a long way to easing pre-party stress. Two salons with decades of professional experience are Hairafter Salon and Spa and Nilli SalonSpa.

On entering Hairafter Salon and Spa, one is immediately struck by the relaxed yet elegant atmosphere, and the dark wood and soft lighting. The salon's décor includes an antique-looking desk and chairs, chandeliers and mirrors with gilded frames.

Art director and owner John Colombo (416-221-6658) has 34 years of experience working with brides and wedding parties. "I like to have the bride here at least a couple of months before the affair to discuss the hairstyle and hairpiece," says Colombo.

"You want to look like yourself, not like a different person. This is in keeping with today's beauty philosophy of styling in a 'free style,' cutting and styling the hair [while] respecting how it naturally grows.

"Hair shows a lot of texture today. Perms are on the way back."

The salon can provide up-dos and make-up for that special day. There is even a private room for fitting wigs. When the room is not serving this purpose, it can become a shaving parlour for a groom and his ushers' pre-wedding shave. The experience is further enhanced while sitting in an antique barber chair, circa 1880.

On the lower level is Hairafter's new spa. Colombo says it's "a one-stop shop that's been working very well, because time is very valuable these days."

A customer may opt to have a manicure at the same time as her colour treatment. Waxing, facials and pedicures are also offered at this full-service spa. It boasts a specialized pedicure chair that provides a whirlpool for the feet.

Hairafter Salon and Spa

Colombo's son, Jean Paolo, a stylist at the salon, won the new protégé award from the Allied Beauty Association at its convention last spring.

Nilli Liman of Nilli SalonSpa (416-487-1762) is an expert stylist, whether you seek an elegant, chic or simple hairstyle. She is the master of creating a cut that allows you to look and feel your best even after you leave the salon.

The salon is billed as "mini Europe in big Toronto." This not only speaks to the international flair of the salon, but is also a reference to the international training that Liman has. She has studied hairstyling in Germany, Israel and London, England, where she attended the Vidal Sassoon Academy.

The Sassoon influence is evident in her styling philosophy. She always considers the the client's hair, face, skin and lifestyle before she begins styling. "After our cut, a client can manage her cut easily, without spending a lot of time and using a lot of materials, like a blow dryer or an iron," says Liman.

She calls herself an educator and can show the client what their hair needs are. "This way they will start to enjoy their hair and themselves with a newfound confidence," she says.

Nilli SalonSpa has been nominated for a Contessa Award, a Canadian beauty industry award, for best-designed salon of 2004. With its hot-red, state-of-the-art chairs juxtaposed with the clean, fresh grey and white walls, the salon looks like the forward-thinking European-influenced salon that it is.

Liman's main concern is that the client leave her salon with beautiful, silky, shiny and healthy hair. Using the correct finishing products is crucial, she notes.

"We spend a lot of time to continually educate ourselves, without which you cannot last in this industry."

She emphasizes that using the wrong hair-care product can do more harm than good.

Rembrandt's The Jewish Bride

Let the portrait of your marriage be a work in progress

By OZZIE NOGG
Special to The CJN

A message to brides everywhere: even if you print your wedding portrait on acid-free, archival paper, it won't last as long as the portrait of Abigail de Pina, the subject of Rembrandt's masterpiece, The Jewish Bride.

And even if you show your wedding album to everyone in town (and all the neighbouring counties), your face will never be seen by the numbers of people who've gazed upon Abigail's shayneh ponim, which hangs in Amsterdam's Rijksmuseum.

Let's face it. All brides are beautiful, but few make the art history books.

Here's what we know about The Jewish Bride. One August day in 1662, Abigail de Pina married Don Miguel de Barrios. The bride was a descendent of a well-known Moroccan rabbinic family and her well-heeled father owned sugar refineries in Holland. Historians described the groom as "one of the more colorful members of the eccentric Jewish community of 17th-century Amsterdam." That's putting it mildly.

Don Miguel de Barrios was born in Andalusia, served as a Spanish military officer in Brussels, and wrote lofty poetry. He was also a Marrano, a Converso, a Jew of medieval Spain who converted to Christianity in order to escape persecution, but who continued to practise his religion in secret.

One account of the day says that "in Brussels, where it was legally forbidden to return to Judaism, he was the Christian Captain Miguel de Barrios, who rubbed epaulets with the social and diplomatic elite, and composed obsequious verses in praise of his native Spain, though not lacking in expressions of Jewish pride."

But when in Amsterdam, where he eventually set up permanent residence, he used his Jewish name, David Levi de Barrios, and openly professed his Judaism.

After the wedding, Rembrandt was commissioned to render a portrait of the couple. Word has it that the aged Rembrandt was then at a low point in his life, and he drew strength from the idyllic image of this loving, stable Jewish family. And here's where things get colourful, both on and off the canvas.

As it turns out, de Barrios, the ba'al tshuvah who reclaimed his heritage, was prone to acts of extreme religious piety, including long periods of fasting that led to ecstatic visions of pagan gods and immoral carryings-on.

De Barrios' loony behaviour sorely offended Amsterdam's Jewish leaders and they forbid him to publish his poetry, for which he was being paid handsomely by wealthy patrons. Cut off from his income, de Barrios cut himself off from mainstream Judaism and became a fanatical follower of the false messiah Shabbetai Zvi.

And where was The Jewish Bride during her husband's crisis of faith? In a state of utter despair.

Shops that outfit your children for their special event

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

When your children reach a milestone – a bar or bat mitzvah or a graduation – you want them to look as great as they feel. Here are two places in the city that will help you find clothes that are just as special as your children.

Maison Vali has been dressing children "from birth to graduation" since 1971. With locations in Yorkville (112 Cumberland St.) and in Etobicoke at the Humbertown Shopping Centre (270 The Kingsway), Maison Vali offers a wide variety of children's clothing for all occasions.

For the past 33 years, Elvira Vali has "been at the forefront of changing the way that kids look." Through her beautiful and unique creations, she has provided customers with excellent quality at affordable prices.

Maison Vali carries a wide variety of brands, including DKNY, Lillie Gaufrette and the new Harry Potter line. The store carries boys clothing to Size 12 and girls to Size 16. Maison Vali is also well-known for its incredible infant collection.

"We're just a nice little store that does everything for everybody," says Barbara Vali, the store manager. The store's staff is knowledgeable and patient, and will give you the extra time you need to pick out something perfect for your little one.

Although Maison Vali has a selection of formal wear, the staff have noticed a shift in demands for it. "Today, kids are dressing very casually, and even long dresses for special occasions are out," Vali says.

For certain occasions, the store can arrange for a custom fitting with Elvira Vali herself. To make sure that the customer is happy with the result, Vali will incorporate their ideas into the design.

Whatever the occasion, you can be sure that Maison Vali will have the perfect clothes for your child.

When it comes time for your son's bar mitzvah, you'll want to make sure that everything is perfect. To get just the right outfit for the occasion, look no further than Beatties. The store has three locations – in Toronto (430 Eglinton Ave. W.), in Mississauga (2880 Argentina Rd.) and in Oakville (1384 Cornwall Rd.).

Since 1950, the company has been specializing in school uniforms and boys clothing. The stores offer clothing for boys from age six to adult. The stores also offer wide selections of brands such as Polo, Timberland, Billabong and Kenneth Cole.

Beatties offers customized formal suits for boys that are suitable for bar mitzvahs or other special occasions. The suits are made in the finest fabrics and are often imported from Italy. As well, the suits are specially made for every customer. All fittings and tailoring are done in-house to ensure the best result.

Maison Vali: From birth to graduation.

In addition to the original suits, the stores also carry an excellent selection of ready-to-wear suits from brands such as Perry Ellis.

Since the bar mitzvah period is a transitional age for boys, custom tailoring is paramount at Beatties. Suits can even be brought back to be re-cut and adjusted.

"We know how important a bar mitzvah is, and we want to make sure that you look perfect", says David Hadden, the company's owner.

Beatties takes your son through the entire process of fitting his suit. They will hold the suit and then tailor it to make sure it fits perfectly. "There's nothing we can't do for the customer," Hadden says. "Nobody walks out unhappy."

For your children to look their best on their special days, you'll want to shop where you can receive the best quality and service. Maison Vali and Beatties will help you achieve that goal.

Rio Entertainment puts people on the dance floor

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

When it comes to the problem of choosing live music for your simchah, Rio Entertainment has the solution.

The Richmond Hill company specializes in putting together bands and live entertainment for every occasion, whether you're looking for a Marilyn Monroe impersonator, a band that can please even the most picky tweens at a bar mitzvah bash, or a classy jazz ensemble for an intimate wedding reception.

Think of Rio Entertainment (905-882-5252) as the ultimate band store, where customers can customize any band to their liking, says owner Isaac Oziel. Customers can mix sounds and styles to create bands that suit their needs, regardless of how diverse those needs are.

"Most bands are all or nothing," he says. "Rio Entertainment is customized."

The company's most popular band is the nine-piece Nu-Rhythm, which has been on the wedding circuit for 14 years and has a musical repertoire that includes swing, disco, R&B, pop, Motown tunes, and Jewish and Hebrew music.

Rhythm Kings is another popular, nine-piece band with seven years of experience. A number of smaller bands – including one that caters specifically to Orthodox simchahs – are also part of Rio Entertainment's product line.

Choosing a band depends on a number of factors, such as the customer's taste in music and the size of an event, Oziel says.

"You can't put a nine-piece band in an event where you only have 120 guests," he explains. But what Oziel can do is create a smaller band with three, four or five players to suit the size of the venue and number of guests.

So if you like Nu-Rhythm's sounds but don't want to splurge for the full ensemble – or don't have enough space for them – Oziel will make sure the smaller band plays many of the same songs.

Budget is usually an equally relevant consideration when band hunting. Rio Entertainment's best band, Nu-Rhythm, is also its priciest. But Oziel says it's possible to create the sound a customer wants within a variety of budgets.

"Budget and size – we can accommodate these requirements," he says.

Of course, the type of music is always a significant consideration. All the bands play horas and pop tunes, but if you want one that can do a few numbers in another language, Oziel will make sure one of the band members can belt out a few tunes in other tongues. Hebrew and Russian are two of the most common requests, but Greek, Italian and Portuguese also make the list.

When Ricky Martin was popular, Oziel – who is of Sephardi background and is a musician himself – took to the stage with the bands to sing La Vida Loca and other Spanish hits.

The age range of guests at an event is also important, says Oziel. Because different generations often have different music tastes, Oziel will ensure that each generation has a chance to dance to its favourite songs.

His theory is simple: play Bubbie and Zaidie's songs first, and then shift to pop and dance to get the kids out on the dance floor and keep them there.

"We have to make sure that what we play appeals to the older generation and definitely the younger generation," he says.

Oziel emphasizes that it's important to book early when considering live music. The most popular dates – long weekends and summer nights for weddings and bar mitzvahs – are reserved months, even years, in advance.

In the last three years, Oziel has expanded Rio Entertainment to include live performances and special acts. His entertainers impersonate famous singers such as Tina Turner, Michael Jackson and Shania Twain. String quartets and Motown shows are also part of the act.

What else can Oziel's crew impersonate?

"Anything you can imagine," he chuckles.

"Our goal is to make a great dance party," says Oziel. "That's what we do best – put people on the dance floor."

Niagara Falls has attracted newlyweds for more than 100 years

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Tourism in Niagara Falls – probably Canada's most recognized destination worldwide – is soaring to new heights, attracting a wide mix of visitors, from family vacationers to, of course, honeymooners.

"Niagara Falls has been a tourism destination for well over 100 years, and within the last 10 years, there has been a considerable change in the type of tourism product inventory that has been developed here in the city, from higher-end brand name hotels to professional level golf courses and the quality of the surrounding wineries," says Caroline Atherton, vice-president of Niagara Falls Tourism in Canada.

"The entire destination is going through, in essence, a renaissance, even Clifton Hill, which is family-oriented. Louis Tussaud's Wax Museum and Houdini's, which were mainstays, are gone. Now there are interactive activities such as the 4-D theatres, the Marvel Comics Interactive Zone and the Great Canadian Midway, which has been revamped from a traditional arcade to state of the art interactive games."

Atherton says that in the Niagara Park Botanical Park Gardens and Butterfly Conservatory there are new displays in the greenhouses. The Bird Aviary is housed in a heritage building that was formerly part of the old Niagara Falls Museum, and before that, a corset factory. Now, the expanded building has gorgeous greenhouses with free-flying birds.

"Niagara Falls is a very solid family market, especially during the summer season, and it's our bread and butter. The thing that really changed was the advent of… Casino Niagara in '96. It started to build a nightlife for Niagara. A second casino opened on June 8 this year. The Fallsview Casino Resort has a hotel, galleria and the Avalon Theatre with well-known Canadian and American acts appearing," Atherton says.

The Jewish Bride evokes strong emotions

On Erev Pesach 1674, a weeping Abigail banged on the door of Rabbi Jacob Sasportas, the most unbending adversary of the heretical Sabbatian movement. Sasportas followed Abigail to her home, where he found de Barrios paralyzed, raving about imminent cataclysms, the end of days and the joys of penitential affliction.

The rabbi, overcome by what he saw – and by his sympathy for Abigail's plight – convinced de Barrios to renounce his apostasy and messianic madness and return to the reasonably sane pursuit of writing poetry.

Keep the lasting message of The Jewish Bride fresh and new

Peace was restored, and though they lived in poverty ever after, the de Barrios' marriage lasted for 12 more years until Abigail's death in 1686.

According to his biographer, the "doting husband memorialized her in poetry, and the epitaph he composed for her grave spoke of 'My doubly good wife Dona Abigail Levy de Barrios – with permanent love for me and with God her high soul.'" That translation strikes me as a bit fractured, but sweetly sincere, nonetheless.

Many art scholars debate the veracity of this story and aren't convinced that the couple in the painting are even a bride and groom (some suggest a father and daughter, or Rebecca and Isaac), let alone Jewish. But scholars don't dispute the fact that Rembrandt created many works of Jewish content – including wedding scenes, synagogues and biblical characters. And it's agreed that at one time, Rembrandt lived near Amsterdam's Jewish quarter, where many of his neighbours and friends were Sephardi Jews whom he used as models.

These debates aside, The Jewish Bride evokes strong emotions from viewers.

As Sister Wendy Beckett has written: "Reverence is the deepest form of respect, a serious desire to recognize another as important in his or her own right. It accepts that we are not central to the universe. It is this attitude of tender humility that Rembrandt expresses [in] The Jewish Bride. His couple is not in their first youth, or beautiful in any classical sense…

"[Yet] we at once know that they love each other. Each gives love and receives it… [they] do not even need to look into each other's eyes. Rather, they ponder with wonder the implications of their blessedness."

So, dear Jewish brides and grooms, even as your wedding pictures fade, keep the lasting message of Rembrandt's loving couple – and of your marriage vows – fresh and new.

Treat your marriage as a work in progress. Show respect for one another. Be tender, humble, give love and receive it. And as the years pass, continue to ponder – with wonder – the implications of your blessedness.

Create your dream dress with bridal couturiers

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Since a wedding is one of the most special moments in life, having the perfect dress is essential. To get the perfect dress, consulting a couturier may be your best bet. To help you find the best couturier for you, we've featured two of the best couture shops in Toronto.

Justina McCaffrey Haute Couture (1-917-704-9281), at 114 Cumberland St., offers both custom-made and read-to-wear dresses for weddings. Originating in Ottawa, the shop opened its doors in Toronto in June of this year.

Justina McCaffrey is run by the husband-and-wife team of David and Justina McCaffrey. Justina is the designer, while her husband takes care of the business end. In the past 15 years, Justina has acquired such celebrity fans as actress Kate Hudson and singer Kathleen Edwards and has become one of the top three bridal couturiers in North America.

> The dresses are made from the finest silks and laces

McCaffrey is known for the impeccable workmanship and quality of her dresses. "My dresses are so well made that they can practically be worn inside out," she says. The dresses are made from the finest silks and laces.

McCaffrey works closely with the manufacturers, so that she can achieve the best results for her brides. For an extra fee, McCaffrey will do private fittings with customers, to incorporate their ideas into the unique design.

When asked about trends, McCaffrey replies, "We are moving away from the strapless dresses because they can be found everywhere else."

McCaffrey's winter 2004 collection features crystals on straps to create the most romantic and beautiful of looks. To keep her creative edge, McCaffrey has also been using colours such as alabaster and green tea as well as pleats and ruffles in her dresses.

McCaffrey's beautiful dresses are enhanced by the store's excellent service. Any bride is "treated like a princess" she says. "To us, she becomes a friend and we are really interested in what she has to say."

Another option in bridal couturiers is Manijeh Couture, (416-789-4111), at 1899 Avenue Rd., just north of Lawrence.

For the past 18 years, Manijeh Couture has been designing high-end custom-made bridal wear. Owner Manijeh Fanaian offers a wide selection of dresses in various different colours and fabrics, as well as formal wear for bar and bat mitzvahs and other special occasions.

Fanaian concentrates on offering the best product and excellent customer service. When consulting with customers, she makes sure that they have a choice of a wide selection of different designs and specialty European fabrics. As well, Fanaian herself will incorporate the customer's own design ideas to make sure that she "meets everyone's personal wishes," she says.

Check out photographers' portfolios before choosing

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Great photographs are the best memories you can have of any simchah, so choosing a photographer carefully is extremely important.

Brian Stevens has more than 20 years of experience in photography. His studio, Green Gecko Photography (905-265-0009), has been around for five years, and it specializes in portraiture for weddings, bar mitzvahs, and other special events.

Green Gecko gets about half its clients from word of mouth. The rest come from advertisements that Stevens places in bridal magazines such as Wedding Bells and Sposa.

His classic portraits are shot with the principles of design and composition in mind, guaranteeing that the end result is a great photograph. Portraits can be shot in black and white, full colour or sepia, which is the new, hot style.

"Sepia is the trend now," Stevens says. "It's very flattering and warmer than black and white."

The Green Gecko studio also uses photojournalism techniques to "create an environment where spontaneous moments happen," Stevens says. The outcome is a more candid photograph that allows for spontaneity and personality to shine through.

Green Gecko Photography hasn't gone digital yet – it still uses portrait film to shoot photographs. But if you notice a spot of dirt on your dress in the proofs, Stevens can use digital software to erase blemishes, or even edit out someone in the background.

Picture by Green Gecko Photography

He believes that providing excellent customer service is as important as taking stunning photographs.

"We don't want the client to feel like they're just another page in the book," he says.

He says the best way to ensure that you get the photographs you want is to communicate with your photographer: tell them exactly what you're looking for so there are no surprises on the day of the big event.

Paul Laszlo, owner of Twins Photo and Video (905-707-2385) with his twin brother Andrew, is another photographer who specializes in wedding and bar mitzvah portraits. With nearly 30 years of experience in Toronto and their native Hungary, the Laszlo brothers are known for adding an old-world European touch to portraits.

What makes Twins Photo and Video unique is its use of lighting, Paul says. The way a subject is lit will change the way a photograph turns out, and the Laszlos are committed to handling lighting to enhance the appearance of each and every person in the portrait.

"You have to be in control of the lighting," says Paul.

Twins Photo and Video takes extra cameras and equipment to each photo shoot, so that if one piece of equipment breaks, photos and photo opportunities won't be lost or destroyed.

"We use backup all the time so photos for sure turn out," he says. "With backup equipment, your photos are guaranteed."

Choose a photographer carefully

The Laszlo brothers also convert old family videos in V8 format to VHS or DVD formats.

"It's very important to save them for the future," says Paul.

When choosing a photographer for your simchah, Stevens recommends that you ask to look at the photographer's portfolio before agreeing to anything. Make sure that their style is what you're looking for so there are no disappointments in the end.

Also important is that you feel you can build a trusting working relationship with your photographer, says Stevens. Subjects need to trust the photographer's eye for composition and style.

Paul Laszlo adds that it's essential to book early, because photographers are reserved early. He says that families who wait the longest to book a photographer usually end up paying a higher price. He also suggests that when customers check out a few photographers before deciding which one to use, they should consider the package that each photographer includes, not just the package's price. Some packages cost more but provide more, he says, while others cost less but the photo packages are smaller.

Stevens understands that most people are excited to see their proofs after a big event. Proofs usually take about two weeks to produce, but big final orders from weddings can take anywhere from six to eight weeks. Family photographs are easier and quicker – final orders can be completed in four to six weeks, and single 8 by 10 photographs can be done within a week.

A honeymoon at Niagara Falls

The new casino resort and surrounding hotel properties continue to attract honeymooners from every country. Atherton says honeymoon couples have been coming to Niagara Falls since Napoleon's younger brother came with his bride in 1803. All newlyweds who register with the city receive a honeymoon certificate entitling them to some two-for-one offers on attractions.

Tourism officials run festivals throughout the year both to offer visitors extra activities and to drive business in the off season. Annual events include the popular Festival of Lights from mid November to mid January, the Niagara Wine and Food Classic held the weekend after Labour Day to kick off the harvest season and the Casino Niagara International Marathon held on the third Sunday in October – the race starts in Buffalo and makes its way across the Peace Bridge, ending at the Canadian falls.

Niagara Falls Tourism in Canada is working with its counterpart on the American side of the falls on the issue of how best to deal with the perception of border and custom issues. Although there is not a lot of cross-boarder promotion at this point, except for the Heritage Doors Open event in October, as the area grows, there will likely be more promotional projects planned by the American and Canadian cities.

"We have traditionally been a strong family market, and now with the new product in this area, we have something for everybody. We see continuous growth and expansion and feel we have a bright future ahead," Atherton says.

Dancers from Jerusalem's Arabesque belly-dancing company perform in a colourful show called The King's Son's Madness as part of the May 2004 Jerusalem Festival of Arts. [IPS photos courtesy of Arabesque]

Israeli women flock to belly-dancing classes

By BARRY DAVIS
Israel Press Service

For the uninitiated, belly dancing is an Eastern form of entertainment with patently sordid associations. Many regard it as an activity involving scantily dressed women seductively gyrating to Eastern music in front of overweight, sex-starved males in dingy clubs. Despite that long-held negative view, belly dancing – or Oriental dance – is taking off in Israel.

Over the past seven or eight years, Oriental dance has emerged from being perceived as an obscure and generally not highly regarded dance form, to a mainstream leisure time activity that attracts large numbers of women from all walks of life and of all ages.

The Sahara City belly-dancing school in Tel Aviv, for example, caters to the full gamut of Israeli women – Jewish, Christian and Muslim, secular and observant – ranging from lawyers, computer programmers and police officers to fortunetellers, soul singers and hairdressers.

Says Sahara City director Tina (for professional reasons, she prefers to maintain a first-name-only approach), "Oriental dance is a form of spiritual nutrition and a supplication, as well as providing a quality means of physical exercise – though it can't be compared to going to an aerobic class. My students learn to look at themselves and to love themselves for what they are."

The youngest student at Sahara City is six, and there are a couple of septuagenarians on the books. Considering the highly sensual element to the dance, isn't six a bit premature to start developing pelvic gyrations? "Belly dancing is not just about sensuality and seductiveness," says Tina. "It is an art form that incorporates joy, sadness, longing and melancholy. To limit it to seductiveness is akin to watching an artistic dancer and focusing exclusively on her bosom. That would be missing the point entirely."

California-born Jerusalemite Malka Emanuel has been involved in belly dancing for more than six years, both as a dancer and a teacher. Like Tina, she sees Oriental dance as a means of empowerment for women. Besides dance, Emanuel also acts as a labour coach and says there is a strong connection between belly dancing and giving birth. "Gyrating the hips is a way of isolating the pain and helping get through it."

Opinions are divided over the origins of belly dancing, but one thing is certain – contrary to popular Western belief, Oriental dance did not originate as a means of seduction performed by concubines to titillate men in high places.

Strong ritual side to belly dancing

Some believe the art form comes from Morocco and, as Emanuel suggests, was initially devised as a means of helping to ease the pain of childbirth. But mostly it was a dance that people did for fun, not as a form of professional entertainment.

In the traditional Arabic home, the women would serve their menfolk their meals and then retire to the women's quarters. Once free of their domestic chores, they would groove and shimmy with one another. There is also evidence of belly dancing being performed by men for men.

"There was a lot of homosexual activity associated with the men's belly-dancing sessions," explains Yael Moav, director of the Jerusalem-based Arabesque belly-dancing school. "As they were prohibited from having premarital sexual relationships with women, they often had them with men."

There is a strong ritual side to belly dancing throughout the Arab world that marks various stages in a woman's life, from menstruation through to her wedding, giving birth and dying. The menstruation dance, for example – called the rahil, meaning awakening or departure – is an initiation ceremony in which a young girl is welcomed to womanhood on having her first period. Belly dancing is also a central feature of Muslim weddings and serves not only as a form of celebration but also as a means for the bride to rejoice in her femininity and to offer the groom his first glimpse of her womanly charms.

U.S.-raised Jerusalemite Rahel Kima was into African ethnic dance before finding her way to the Oriental dance form. She says both forms are strongly grounded, in contrast with ballet, which emphasizes the upper part of the body. Kima, who also teaches yoga to pregnant women, feels belly dancing can offer a means of expressing a wide range of feelings. "I think it is very much a matter of what you project and what you have inside to bring out. It is very powerful. Don't forget, it comes from your stomach, which is really the birth energy source of the body."

In a country where there is often a deep gulf between secular and Orthodox Jews, increasing numbers of Jewish Israeli women from the religious side of the tracks are also learning to belly dance.

Sarah Cohen (not her real name), a religious woman in her 20s, has been attending Sahara City for more than two years. Although she feels there is absolutely nothing wrong, from a purely religious standpoint, with learning to belly dance, Cohen said she prefers to remain anonymous because of the response she believes there would be within her community once word got out. "When people hear about something like this, their immediate reaction is negative. I don't want to be exclusively associated with belly dancing. It's only one element of my life."

Hilla Hodaya, on the other hand, feels there is far more leniency within the haredi community than secular Jews think. Hodaya lives in Jerusalem's haredi district of Geula and attends the Arabesque school. "Taking part in Oriental dance isn't exactly considered a badge of honour in Geula," says Hodaya, who is a physiotherapist by profession. "But there are all sorts of people here, with all sorts of interests. I got into it because I gave keep-fit classes for women and wanted to do something different for myself during my leisure time. Belly dancing is a much more pleasant way to keep the body healthy."

Art form, or physical fitness technique – social implications regardless – for now belly dancing in Israel is taking off in leaps and bounds.

Get untangled from web of bad dates

By AMY KLEIN
Jewish Journal of Greater Los Angeles

Evan Marc Katz has never had a bad Internet date. Well, except for the time his date had an aneurysm – and that was hardly his fault, was it? OK, aside from the time that Katz's blind date had a seizure, he's never had a bad Internet date. That's because he follows his own rules culled from five years of online dating (on seven different sites) as well as working at Internet websites.

Now the 31-year-old screenwriter has parlayed his experience into E-Cyrano – an online dating consulting service, which, among other things – writes clients' essays for their profiles. He has also written I Can't Believe I'm Buying This Book: A Commonsense Guide to Successful Internet Dating (Ten Speed Press), a cheeky, practical how-to book for newbies and old-timers – from naive beginners who don't know where to start to jaded experts who don't know how to stop.

> Is Jewish dating different from regular online dating?

Jewish Journal: You used to work at JDate? How did you come up with the idea for this book?

Evan Marc Katz: I was already online dating for a few years when I ended up working on JDate… After about two weeks on the job, I realized that I could write a book, because there were so many dissatisfied customers, and I felt when I was on the phone – even if it was a billing question – generally how little thought they were putting into their essays. I made my job into what I thought it should be… It was a day job that just took on a life of its own.

JJ: Is Jewish dating different from regular online dating?

EMK: I think people take it just a little bit more seriously. I think that the quality of people on JDate is generally a little bit higher quality. Something endemic to Judaism is insularity and where they place their values – family, education, tradition. For people who stay within the tribe… it's the name brand.

JJ: Has the Internet taken the place of the Jewish community?

EMK: It's created a different sense of community. It's not a replacement for anything – it's a supplement… It's another way for people to meet people. But it's not a replacement.

JJ: Do you think it's disingenuous for E-Cyrano to write someone's profile?

EMK: To me, it's the equivalent of a resumé. If you're making up jobs on a resumé, that's no good. If you're trying to put together a resumé that would distinguish me from the pack, that's good.

> 'My dates are never bad!'

We're just writing down what people say. I think a lot of people don't know why they're interesting. This is a tool to get you in the door, not to get you a job. If a person can't live up to their own hype – if you go out with someone who wrote a good essay, without talking or e-mailing – if you go out with them, you get what you deserve, because you didn't do screening. I don't go on bad dates. I refuse to. It's simply because I take my time. My dates are – at the worst – there's no chemistry. They're never bad.

JJ: You never went on a bad date?

EMK: I think that these car wrecks can be avoided if you're looking a little bit farther ahead… Your love life is as serious as your work life and you should take it as seriously. I do think that the more you put in, the more you get out.

There's more to online dating than slapping up a picture [My book tells] how to get the most out of online dating sites, what kind of photos to post, where to meet someone and when to meet someone. I try to save people a lot of time and money and frustration from my own dating experiences.

JJ: What does it mean to be a successful online dater? You're not married, and yet you're writing this book…

EMK: You are a success in online dating if you are consistently meeting good people and enjoying the process. It's not the Internet's job to legislate whether people are compatible, or of finding "the one," but if you're meeting good people, it's just a matter of time. You attract what you put out there. If you have a negative outlook in your profile, that's not all that attractive, is it? I am very positive about this, not because I'm Mr. Sunshine, but because I have lots of success and meet lots of people. I have fallen in love and I've had all these experiences, except for a ring on the finger… and that's the next thing around the corner.

JJ: Do you think that online dating has ruined dating? Do you think it's made people tired of dating?

EMK: It does become somewhat addicting, and because there is always someone else, it makes it easier to revolve… it has to do with the medium, the ease with which we meet people. People become disposable. That revolving door is only going to stop when you decide to do it. I've heard a woman who says, "I'm not doing this anymore," and to me that's like having a bad meal at a restaurant and going on a hunger strike. Place it in perspective – you never have to go on a bad date if you take your time and you're a good judge of character. If you're going on five dates a week, that doesn't show much confidence that you think anything's going to work out.

Slow down! You take control of this medium instead of letting it take control of you.

A portrait of my wedding

By SORIYA DANIELS
Speical to The CJN

After only two hours of sleep, I woke up on Aug. 13, 2000, to the sound of rain hitting my hotel window. Feeling as if I had a pit in my stomach, I got out of bed, terrified and excited all at once.

It was my wedding day, the culmination of three months of harried planning. I desperately wanted everything about this day to be perfect, to reflect the perfect love that Brad and I shared.

I scanned the piles around my room: my veil, bridesmaids' gifts, personal belongings I would need for the few days following the wedding, and lavender wedding guides I composed, in which I explained to my guests all the traditional customs and rites they would be a part of that day. That last item made me a bit uptight. "Will my family and friends be utterly lost," I wondered.

After all, I had not become Orthodox until I was 20, and my parents, three sisters, relatives and friends could not believe the transformation. They just soothed themselves with the old adage, "Live and let live." Brad, who also became religious in his 20s, comes from a similar background to me. Actually, his mother is vehemently Reform, and loudly voices her objections to everything we do (in a sweet way, of course.)

Fast-forward three hours and two hairstyles later and the guests are arriving. There is a lot of excitement on two floors. Brad and the men are at the chatan's tisch, where a great deal of legal business is being transacted – the tnaim are agreed on and signed by two witnesses, ditto for the ketubah. And in between, Chassidim who Brad studied with were toasting jubilant l'chaims, while his college and medical-school buddies were trying to make sense of what was going on and what they were supposed to do.

When a few guys stepped forward to dance, the celebration was in full swing.

Brad's longtime friend Jon said, "I hadn't seen Brad in five years, and just as I was about to give Brad a high-five, he started reading this blessing in Aramaic. It went on for so long, I thought we would miss the party upstairs with all the women."

Suddenly, the moment I dreamed of! Accompanied by spirited music, Brad arrived upstairs for the bedeken. This was no ordinary arrival. It was more like a parade of cheering fans extending far behind him, singing jubilant wedding melodies and clapping. The excitement was palpable. Brad approached my throne, whispered in my ear, blessed me in the verses of the kohanim and draped my veil over my head. With that, he was gone.

Soriya and Brad Daniels

This was exactly how I wanted my wedding to be – imbued with meaning and tradition. I was so grateful to the Almighty for sending me my bashert, who exceeded my every expectation and dream, I might add. Throughout my wedding, I thanked God for all the goodness he bestowed upon me and prayed for our future. It is so important to pray at your own wedding, for there is no greater opportunity for divine intervention.

My Jewish wedding: meaning and tradition

On their wedding day, a bride and groom each experience a Yom Kippur of a lifetime and are forgiven for any past wrongdoing. This is the purest and most auspicious day of our lives and should be taken advantage of. The spiritual ascendance that accompanied our wedding also provided a tremendous opportunity to pray for people who were ill or were in need of divine assistance in any regard. Needless to say, when I was under the chupah, I had a lengthy list of friends, and friends of friends, all seeking their bashert. The chupah was the most remarkable part of our wedding.

Luckily, our rabbi was hysterically funny and made everyone feel comfortable, inspired and entertained, all at once. We also added some unique customs to the service, such as calling up all the kohanim from the crowd to bless us in the same verses in which they traditionally bless the congregation during the holidays. This was quite humorous because Brad is a kohen, as are his father, brothers, uncles and cousins. They are not religious, however, and had no advance knowledge this would be sprung upon them. We wanted it to be a surprise and I purposely omitted it from the wedding guide. I did, however, photocopy sheets with the transliteration of the verses. It was still a struggle, nonetheless, but it looked great on the wedding video! Just picture about 30 men with tallits draped over their heads blessing us as we stood in our chupah!

Next, we called up one of Brad's single friends (who used to attend Jewish singles events with him "pre-me") to finish off the cups of wine used during the betrothal and marriage blessings. Another surprise! "That was really tough," he recalls.

But in between the laughs and bewilderment, I could imagine what my proper, erudite grandmother was thinking. "At least the wedding was at a country club," she said later, "and you and Brad should just be very happy together."

Surprisingly, many guests remarked that this was the longest and most exciting marriage ceremony they had ever witnessed.

"That was the best part," said my former co-worker and friend, Henry. "You want to know something funny?" Henry added, "Sotoko [his Japanese wife who had just arrived in the United States and barely spoke English] just assumed this was what an American wedding was like," he said with a chuckle.

Not everyone was pleased with the separate dancing, and my parents even tried to sneak in a dance together, which quickly got broken up. "What's the big deal!" my mother protested. "It's not like your dad and I are not married."

I can recall being lowered in my seat from high in the air and being placed side by side with Brad. Next came the performances and out came the wedding "shtick" accoutrements to enhance their performance.

Suddenly, the Orthodox guests among us were in costume and juggling, others did solo dance performances, some ladies passed out party hats and streamers, and our short rabbi was dancing on a taller guest's shoulders. Then, a few young guys stepped forward to dance and the celebration was in full swing.

"It was so crazy, I have never seen anything like it," said my bubbly 20-year-old sister, Shanna. "I liked the Israeli songs, but it would have been nice to have some English dance songs, too."

My father felt awkward dancing with only guys, so aside from trying to sneak in a dance with my mother, he just shmoozed and ate to his heart's delight. "The wedding was lovely," he told me the other day, "and filled with spirit and energy. That was really special."

As our party favour, we gave out wedding benchers, which were all in Hebrew since the version with the English translation was too expensive after all was said and done (a lot was said and done between my parents and my in-laws). To our dismay, and reflecting the demographic of our bunch, two-thirds of the benchers were left behind on the table at the end of the wedding. Poor Uncle Lenny had been assigned the task of collecting them. We had so many left over that we donated them to a struggling kosher pizza parlor in Maryland.

Unfortunately, our guests bid us adieu after the dessert. In other words, hardly anyone, save for our immediate families, stayed for the Birkat Hamazon. This ritual included reciting the Sheva Brachot, the special marital blessings recited under the chupah, which are then recited every day for a week thereafter. You need a minyan of 10 men to recite the Sheva Brachot, and we didn't meet our quorum. It was so embarrassing – we had to pull the men from the band! So the music stopped, the Sheva Brachot were recited, and the wedding ended anti-climatically.

I was too happy to care. After all, each ending marks a new beginning. For us, it is parenthood.

There must be something to those Sheva Brachot!

Israel hosts Beslan survivors

Thirty-eight residents of Beslan, including 18 children ages seven to 16 who survived the Sept. 1, 2004, attack by Chechen terrorists, arrived in Israel recently for a three-week holiday. The children were accompanied by several parents, a psychologist and a doctor. The trip was the initiative of the Association of Caucasus Immigrants, who financed it along with the city of Ashkelon, where the visitors were based during their visit. Some 330 adults and children were killed in the hostage-taking incident. [Israel photo]

Jewish values shape justice minister's work

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Both Jewish and Islamic traditions say the test of a just society is how it treats its most vulnerable, said Canada's justice minister and attorney general earlier this week.

Speaking on Sunday afternoon at York University for the inaugural Limmud Canada – a festival of Jewish learning based on the annual event of the same name in Great Britain – Irwin Cotler called it a tragedy that we don't act on our common teachings.

Justice Minister Irwin Cotler

In a talk titled "Jewish Values, Human Rights and Public Policy," Cotler said that shortly after his appointment last December, he announced to the media that the Jewish injunction "Tzedek, tzedek tirdof" (Justice, justice, shall you pursue) would guide his work as a principle for building a just, compassionate and humane society.

Group claims Hamas still raising funds in Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Islamic terrorist group Hamas has resumed fundraising in Canada through a front organization that offers charitable tax receipts to donors, an activist group stated earlier this week.

The International Relief Fund for the Afflicted and Needy, IRFAN-Canada, has taken over for the defunct Jerusalem Fund for Human Services as Hamas' fundraising arm in Canada, according to the Canadian Coalition for Democracies (CCD).

However, a spokesperson for the organization denied the allegations. "We have nothing to do with the Jerusalem Fund," said Rasem Abdel-Majid, IRFAN-Canada's general manager. "This is an international relief [agency]. We have no connections to anybody."

Abdel-Majid also rejected suggestions the group supports Hamas. "That's not true," he said. "I want [CCD] to come out with proof of that."

CCD called on the federal government to freeze IRFAN's funds, prosecute the people behind it and explain how an organization with clear links to the Jerusalem Fund could have obtained the right to issue tax receipts for donations that ultimately benefit the banned terrorist organization Hamas.

"It really makes you wonder what the CRA [Canadian Revenue Agency] is doing when they grant charitable status to a group whose linkages to a banned organization in Canada is so transparent," said Alastair Gordon, director of communications for CCD.

News in Brief

CANADA

UIA Names Israel Rep

TORONTO — Israel Appeal Federations Canada (UIAFC), which represents 10 Jewish federations and communities across Canada, announced that Yossi Tanuri has been named director general of UIA Israel, Canada. Tanuri takes up the Jerusalem-based position in February. The Jerusalem native has lived in Canada since 2001, serving as a Keren Hayesod representative and director of major gifts for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

CJC Meets Minister

OTTAWA — A Canadian Jewish Congress delegation met recently with Raymond Chan, federal minister of state for multiculturalism, as part of CJC efforts to promote civil discourse and the elimination of anti-Semitism and racism in Canada. Earlier this year, Justice Minister Irwin Cotler said Ottawa plans to unveil a "national action plan against racism" that would include beefed-up hate crimes laws and greater promotion of multiculturalism. National executive director Manuel Prutschi said CJC "urged [Chan] to have anti-Semitism singled out explicitly for immediate action in any new comprehensive government anti-racism strategies."

Shul, Mosque Feted

TORONTO — Temple Har Zion and the Ja'ffari Islamic Centre, neighbouring houses of worship in Thornhill, Ont., that have shared a 200-car parking lot for 25 years, were honoured last week with a Harmony Award, which "recognizes leaders who have played key roles in eliminating social barriers and broadening the cultural fabric of Canada." The Harmony Movement – a Canadian non-profit group that promotes harmony, diversity and equality – said it gave them the award for "strong mutual respect for each other's religions and cultures," as well as for joint youth anti-racism and homelessness initiatives, and for their joint condemnation of arson at a local mosque and the firebombing of the United Talmud Torahs in Montreal.

Scrolls Chair Named

VANCOUVER — Trinity Western University (TWU), an Evangelical Christian school in Langley, B.C., has been awarded $1.4 million from Ottawa to set up a Canada Research Chair in Dead Sea Scrolls studies. Biblical studies professor Peter Flint – the head of TWU's Dead Sea Scrolls Institute, an author of many Scrolls-related books and the editor of the Isaiah Scroll – was named to the position, which is funded by grants of $200,000 a year over seven years. The scrolls "provide a window for understanding the Jewish background of Christianity," TWU said in a release.

WORLD

AMIA Appeal

BUENOS AIRES — Argentine Jewish groups last week appealed the acquittal of five defendants in the 1994 bombing of Buenos Aires' AMIA Jewish centre. The DAIA political umbrella group, the AMIA Jewish community centre and the largest victims' relatives group joined in the appeal. Five locals were acquitted earlier this year of involvement in the unsolved attack, which killed 85 people.

Extremists Rally

BERLIN — More than 1,000 right-wing extremists rallied at a World War II military cemetery near Berlin last week. The event, which a court refused to ban, marked a day of mourning for fallen soldiers that has been adopted by extremists to celebrate members of the SS and German army. Several neo-Nazi marches have been held since September, when two extremist parties earned enough votes in former East German states to win seats in local parliaments. Three such parties want to join forces to increase their electoral chances.

Madonna a Key Jew?

NEW YORK — Madonna was included in the annual list of the most influential Jews in America published by the Forward. The paper said the pop icon "is not Jewish but might well be the world's most famous practitioner of Judaism." Topping the list was U.S. Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg. Others in the top 5 were novelist Philip Roth and late-night TV comic Jon Stewart.

Marrying for Dollars

BALTIMORE — The Baltimore-based kosher organization Star-K is offering a cash prize to any matchmaker who marries off an Orthodox woman in the city. It said it's offering $2,000 in response to a "crisis" among Orthodox singles. The single woman must be at least 22 years and two months old at the time the engagement is announced.

Christians, Jews Rally Against Anti-Semitism

VANCOUVER — Some 400 Jews and Christian Zionists rallied outside the Vancouver Art Gallery earlier this month against anti-Semitic comments by a local imam and statements by Canadian Islamic Congress president Mohammed Elmasry that all Israelis over age 18 are legitimate targets because they serve in the army.

Rabbi Andrew Rosenblatt of Shara Tzedek Synagogue told the crowd that comments by East Vancouver cleric Sheik Younus Kathrada – who, in the text of a sermon posted on the Internet, called Jews "the brothers of monkeys and swine" – were outside the norms of Canadian values.

"The sheik has said these statements were taken out of context. I couldn't agree more," the Western Jewish Bulletin quoted the rabbi as saying.

Dubbed "Solidarity with our Jewish Neighbours," the Nov. 7 event was organized by a group called the Jewish and Christian Action Committee.

Other speakers included Holocaust survivor Rita Akselrod, Conservative MP Russ Hiebert and Pastor Walter Gamble, who said Israel's control over Jerusalem is a biblical right.

Greater Canadian role in Mideast hailed by Israel

Offer to monitor PA election 'a very positive sign,' ambassador says

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Just days after being taken to task for sending his foreign minister to Yasser Arafat's funeral, Prime Minister Paul Martin is winning praise for offering to help oversee the Palestinian Authority's coming election to replace its late president.

It's part of Martin's plan to get Canada more involved in the Middle East peace process – a move that was encouraged by U.S. President George W. Bush after the two leaders conferred following Bush's victory in the recent presidential election.

Martin also spoke to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on Nov. 1 to congratulate Sharon on winning a Knesset vote to move forward with his plan to unilaterally disengage from Gaza.

Martin expressed Canada's condolences for the deaths of three Israelis in a Nov. 1 suicide bombing in Tel Aviv.

The prime minister also discussed a greater Canadian involvement in the Middle East peace process with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, King Abdullah of Jordan and Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia.

In a phone call last week to interim Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas, Martin offered to send election monitors to oversee the Jan. 9 Palestinian vote.

"I made the offer," Martin was quoted by Canadian Press. "I think it really depends on how the [Palestinian] Authority structures the elections, but we're certainly prepared to do our share.

"We have great expertise in running elections. And Canada is prepared [to ensure] that those elections take place."

Martin's overture was welcomed by Israel's new ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker.

"I see this as a very positive sign," Baker told The CJN. "We think that Canada can play a central role in helping push forward the peace process and helping encourage the Palestinians to build up their own good governance."

In his discussions with Canadians officials, Baker said he has "stressed the desire of Israel for Canada to become a more centrally involved player in the process, especially now in light of changes everyone anticipates [following Arafat's death]."

The ambassador added that Israel believes Canada can also play "a more active role" at the United Nations "to try and ensure that matters between Israelis and Palestinians are dealt with at the negotiating table rather than being channeled into the political process."

He said Canada could become involved in "other fields," aside from the peace process.

Martin told reporters he believes Canada can also play an important role by helping to develop financial institutions and infrastructure.

Baker said it's possible that once peace talks resume in earnest, Canada will resume its leadership role on the sensitive issue of Palestinian refugees.

Canada has presided over the Refugee Working Group, part of the multilateral round of negotiations that grew out of the 1991 Madrid peace conference. But the talks have been dormant for several years.

Baker said Israel won't interfere in the Palestinian vote.

"The Palestinians are trying to sort themselves out," he said. "Israel has an interest in making sure [they] hold elections and [Sharon] has stated publicly that Israel will help them as much as possible."

Baker said Sharon also invited Martin to visit Israel. There were no dates discussed, but "there was a willingness" on Martin's part to accept.

The question of Canada's continued funding of a controversial United Nations agency that assists Palestinian refugees continues to percolate.

Canada has said it will continue to provide funds to the United Nations Relief and Works

Kinneret Bosani — A Survivor of Terror — Not a Victim

Kinneret is now studying filmmaking and plans to produce a documentary about her hopes for peace in Israel.

March 30, 2002, was just an ordinary day at "My Coffee Shop" on Allenby Street in Tel Aviv, until a huge explosion forced Kinneret Bosani to the ground. As a result of this suicide bombing, Kinneret endured severe injuries to her head, the loss of one lung, and damage to her right eye. Hospitalized for 5 months in the Burn Unit, Kinneret suffered third-degree burns to over 70% of her body. Clinging to life by a thread, she was unconscious for two weeks and kept in a drug-induced coma for 5 months to help cope with the pain.

"Who knew that at 24 years of age my life would take such a drastic turn?"

Today Kinneret continues to undergo numerous surgeries in Israel and abroad. "Beit Halochem, Tel Aviv is where I feel most comfortable. Here I receive my daily rehabilitation through physiotherapy and hydrotherapy." Guided by professional coaches, Kinneret is able to swim in the heated pool and exercises in a state-of-the-art fitness centre. As part of the healing process, Kinneret participates in specialized art, computer and cultural programs.

Supported and motivated by her family and new friends at Beit Halochem Kinneret has realized that she is determined, "... to live and to live at any cost."

The four Beit Halochem Centres in Israel offer both physical and emotional support to our heroes and their families. Giving them the best care and rehabilitation they deserve is our priority.

PLEASE ASSIST the more than 50,000 disabled war veterans and victims of terror who turn to Beit Halochem to help them in their recovery.

A Chanukah Reminder from
Steeles Memorial Chapel
For many of us, Chanukah is a time to recall memories of time spent with family and loved ones.
Unfortunately, some seniors are left with only that ... memories.
If there's an elderly person whom you care for, visit, and light a candle with them. Make sure they're in good health, eating nutritionally and taking medication as prescribed.
It's amazing how a little love and caring can make such a big difference.

The true root cause

From the editor's desk

The oft-cited mantra of so many hard-core ideologues of both the left and the right in North America and in Europe is that Israel's unresolved conflict with the Palestinians is the root cause of the Islamic world's – not just the Osama Bin Laden Islamists' – anger with the United States (if not with the entire Western world). It is deeply embraced by an alarmingly large number of anti-Israel demonstrators, hecklers and marchers on university campuses.

Two recent items in the news, one would think, might inspire the marchers to channel their knee-jerk, anti-Israel wrath in a different direction. But, alas, the facts have never been a match for an ideologue's pre-determined, templated "truth."

By all accounts former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat died a very wealthy man. Last year, Forbes magazine ranked him sixth on the list of "the richest kings, queens and despots," with an estimated private coffer of at least $300 million (US). Swiss investment adviser Jean-Claude Robard recently told Al-Jazeera satellite television that Arafat had bank accounts in Switzerland, Austria, Luxembourg and the Cayman Islands. A team of American accountants commissioned by the Palestinian Authority itself earlier in the year concluded that part of Arafat's personal wealth was in a secret portfolio worth close to $1 billion.

The disclosures of Arafat's wealth, however, have not even slightly dented the Teflon bumper of his be-knighted and be-sainted band wagon.

Yet, there is a more compelling truth about him that must be told and understood: he made his people's lives penurious and miserable by launching a war of terror against Israel. And what monies there were available to Palestinian Authority to abate their misery, he brazenly stole.

The U.S. Senate's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations reported last week that the monies stolen by the former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein from the UN-administered Oil for Food program was far higher than previously thought. According to a report in the Wall Street Journal, Hussein probably pocketed "an estimated $21.3 billion in illegal revenue during the 12-year life of the UN economic sanctions" against his regime. The amount may go higher still for according to the head of the investigation, Senator Norm Coleman of Minnesota, the $21.3 was "an evolving figure."

While Iraqis were suffering shortages of the basic necessities of life, including precious medical and food supplies, their leader, much as the leader of the Palestinians did to his people, stole from them for his own sinister and abusive purposes.

And yet, the behaviours of Arafat and Saddam, it has been well chronicled, are not the exceptions in the Arab world. They are, rather, the norm, though, the extent of their personal corruption and false affection for their own people may outreach the other Arab regimes.

The chroniclers of the dysfunction in the Arab world have been many. One of the most authoritative such accounts, readers will recall, was compiled by a group of Arab intellectuals two years ago as the "Arab Human Development Report 2002," and published by the United Nations Development Programme.

Based on the report, The Economist wrote the following synopsis about the countries of the Arab world.

"With barely an exception, its autocratic rulers, whether presidents or kings, give up their authority only when they die; its elections are a sick joke; half its people are treated as lesser legal and economic beings, and more than half its young, burdened by joblessness and stifled by conservative religious tradition, are said to want to get out of the place as soon as they can.

"One in five Arabs still live on less than $2 a day. And over the past 20 years, growth in income per head, at an annual rate of 0.5 per cent, was lower than anywhere else in the world, except sub-Saharan Africa. At this rate, says the report, it will take the average Arab 140 years to double his income, a target that some regions are set to reach in less than 10 years. Stagnant growth, together with a fast-rising population, means vanishing jobs. Around 12 million people, or 15 per cent of the labour force, are unemployed, and on present trends the number could rise to 25 million by 2010.

"In the 1,000 years since the reign of the Caliph Mamoun [a Persian king in the ninth century], say the authors, the Arabs have translated as many books as Spain translates in one year."

The report identified three major reasons for the profound stagnation of the Arab world: a lack of political freedoms; the inferior quality of education (65 million adults are illiterate); and the oppression of women. (One in every two Arab women still can neither read nor write. Their participation in their countries' political and economic life is the lowest in the world.)

It gladdens no heart to report upon the sorry economic, social and intellectual state of the Arab world. But it is the nearly universal downtrodden human condition in the Arab world that is the true root cause of the Islamic world's anger at the West. Money is not lacking there. The region is awash in it. But like Arafat and Saddam, Arab potentates have no compunction in stealing from their own people, for they have only one purpose for their governments: the preservation of self and power. Rather than investing in the infrastructure of their own countries and in the betterment of their own respective societies, they prefer to invest in the hatred of the Jewish state.

CHRISTIANS URGED TO VISIT ISRAEL:

Israeli Tourism Minister Gideon Ezra, back row 4th from left, met last week with Christian clergy from various denominations to sign a historic proclamation "to encourage pilgrimage to the Holy Land." The document, which is being sent to Christian leaders worldwide, says tourists are as safe in Israel as anywhere else and that now is the time for Christians to build bridges of friendship with the Jewish state. In coming weeks, Ezra plans to meet both the Palestinian and Egyptian ministers of tourism to encourage visitors to return to the region.

CanWest acquires 50 per cent of Jerusalem Post

CanWest Global Communications Corp. is poised to acquire a 50 per cent interest in Israel's venerable Jerusalem Post newspaper and other publications in the Palestine Post group of companies.

CanWest announced last week it is entering into a partnership agreement with Mirkaei Tikshoret Group Ltd. (MTL), an Israeli firm with holdings in radio, newspapers and magazines, to become a joint owner and operator of the Post companies.

MTL will purchase the properties from Hollinger International Inc. for $13.2 million (US) and CanWest will subsequently partner with the Israeli-based company to run the Post group.

"The partnership agreement will afford CanWest a substantial role in the direction and management of the [Palestine] Post Group," a CanWest news release stated.

"It is well known that CanWest has harboured a long-standing interest in the Jerusalem Post because of its well-established brand," said Leonard Asper, president and CEO of CanWest.

"We are delighted with this opportunity to work with MTL to unleash the considerable untapped potential of the Jerusalem Post Group and to extend the reach and influence of the Group's flagship newspaper and other media properties around the world, but particularly in North America where CanWest's strong printing, sales and marketing expertise can be utilized."

The Jerusalem Post was founded in 1932 by American journalist Gershon Agron as the Palestine Post. It changed to its current name in 1953. In addition to the Jerusalem Post newspaper and the Jerusalem Report magazine, the Post properties include the International Jerusalem Post, a weekly publication, the Weekend Jerusalem Post, published in New York, the Edition Francais Jerusalem Post, jpost.com, an online news website with 14 million pages viewed per month, and Internet radio station jpradio.com.

In the past few years, the Post has undergone many changes. After it was acquired by Hollinger International in 1989-90, it shifted its editorial focus to the right. However, the newspaper's publisher, Tom Rose, resigned in May in the wake of a difficult relationship with the newspaper's editorial staff, and Bret Stephens recently resigned as editor-in-chief. He was replaced by David Horovitz of the Jerusalem Report.

Conrad Black, who controls Hollinger International through Toronto-based holding company Hollinger Inc., has come under investigation for allegedly wrongfully taking millions of dollars in improperly authorized payments.

Hollinger International has been unloading properties in the midst of an acrimonious shareholder dispute over Black's alleged wrongdoing. In July, Hollinger International sold the Daily Telegraph of London to the Barclay brothers for $1.2 billion (US). It still owns the Chicago Sun-Times and several smaller papers.

School board tells staff to review its guidelines

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

The Toronto District School Board has advised staff to review the board's guidelines for dealing with contentious topics after a Jewish student complained about a school presentation that ended with a poem about Palestinian oppression by Israelis.

"The poem only presented one side of the conflict," said Seth Buchman, a Grade 11 student at Earl Haig Secondary School.

An investigation was launched after the student complained about the prejudicial nature of the presentation to Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

Student complaint prompts action

"Controversial material must be treated in a fair manner that is thorough, balanced and free of unfair biases," said a Toronto District School Board (TDSB) equity department memo sent to all staff.

It recommended that staff review guidelines and strategies in the TDSB Controversial and Sensitive Issues document, which describes how to deal with controversial topics that have come up in the past.

"We want to educate staff to make sure they're inclusive," said Yaw Obeng, TDSB supervising principal for equity, inner city.

The memo also warned that "sometimes trips, performances and events that have been past practice for years may be insensitive because of programming changes, etc."

It cited as an example the presentation at Earl Haig Secondary School by ARCfest, a group that organizes a five-day human rights arts festival, which, the board said, failed to meet the standards held by TDSB policies.

Before it was seen in the schools, ARCfest was endorsed by legitimate organizations and individuals, including the Ontario Human Rights Commission and Toronto City Councillor Olivia Chow.

CJC spokesperson Simon Rosenblum said that while he is very satisfied with the memo, he hopes an educational process will be undertaken at those schools where ARCfest appeared.

In its investigation with the school staff involved, the TDSB discovered that, in addition to the anti-Israel bias, there were other problems with the performance, Obeng said.

According to the TDSB memo, "the scripts were changed, and unbalanced perspectives [were] presented dealing with social issues, without the knowledge of the school.

"Without the proper preparation, students, staff and community members can find themselves ill-equipped to deal with the fallout of a poor and inappropriate performance."

The memo recommended that "staff members request transcripts of actual performances when possible" and "do pre-work with students to promote critical thinking and ability to respectfully analyze different viewpoints."

Josh Bloch, one of the ARCfest co-ordinators, said he did not want to comment on the TDSB report. However, he said that "it is ARCfest's intention to provide a space for voices that have been marginalized and haven't been provided with the same opportunity to express their views.

"In this case, the programming included all sorts of issues facing young people, including issues facing women, people of colour, immigrants, and also a woman of Palestinian descent who spoke of her experience as a Palestinian."

The ARCfest festival is hosted by Face in the Crowd Collective, which features art exhibitions and performances focusing on human rights.

Ontario Human Rights Commission director François Larsen said that as far as he is concerned "the matter has been taken care of" and the Ontario Human Rights Commission "doesn't see any need to initiate any further investigation into the matter."

Toronto City Councillor Olivia Chow did not return The CJN's calls.

Professor denounced for York U charges

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The director of Israel affairs for Hillel of Greater Toronto, Tilly Shames, praised both her organization and Canadian Jewish Congress for responding quickly last week after a York University professor distributed what she described as offensive literature on campus.

After a film presentation sponsored by Solidarity for Palestinian Rights (SPHR), a student group, David Noble, a history professor, handed out literature that alleged the York University Foundation, the school's fundraising arm, is "biased by the presence and influence of staunch pro-Israel lobbyists, activities and fundraising agencies."

The material, labelled "The York University Foundation: the Tail that Wags the Dog," contained a list of some foundation board members and their links to Jewish community groups.

Shames said she was distressed to see individuals of a similar ethnic and philanthropic background being targeted.

"It seems they are being targeted not only for being Jewish, but for being charitable as well," she said.

Noble's actions were denounced in a joint statement by York University, the York University Foundation, SPHR and Hillel at York.

"York strongly condemns this highly offensive material, which singles out certain members of the York community on the basis of their ethnicity and alleged political views, including philanthropic volunteers who serve on the board of the York University Foundation," said York president Lorna Marsden.

"These views must not be permitted to diminish a culture of mutual respect on our campus which unites us as a community," she said.

SPHR president Furat Al Yassin said, "We stand behind our commitment to combat all forms of racism, discrimination and misinformation. SPHR was unaware of the material, which was distributed without warning and in no way endorses the views expressed. Our goal is to promote and protect Palestinian human rights both locally and internationally and we categorically reject any effort to distort our aims."

Dori Borshiov, president of Hillel at York, said Hillel joins "with others within the York University community in expressing our shock to see such inflammatory material on our campus."

Ed Morgan, president, Canadian Jewish Congress, said he was also pleased that the university acted quickly to denounce Noble's action, adding that "in our society we praise philanthropists. One of the most beneficial things a person can do is fund a university program.

"People who do this are to be praised. We consider it quite offensive that anyone should try to chill the praiseworthy actions of philanthropists in our community."

Noble is also attempting to stop the university from cancelling classes on religious holidays such as Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and Good Friday, alleging that it is against the York University Act of 1965, Article 15.

The act says that "no religious test shall be required of any professor, lecturer, teacher, officer, employee or student of the university, nor shall any religious observances according to the regulations of any particular denomination or sect be imposed upon them." On this matter, Morgan said that the university has the right to cancel classes and should accommodate religious needs whenever possible.

Noble told The CJN that his lawyers have advised him not to talk to the press because he is in the midst of filing suit against the university for infringing upon his academic freedom and for defamation.

IRAN HAS PLEDGED TO STOP IT'S SECRET NUKE PROGRAM...
BUT ISRAEL SAYS THAT IRAN HAS A SECRET SECRET PROGRAM!!
AND ISRAEL'S PLANNED RESPONSE TO IRAN'S SECRET SECRET PROGRAM...
IS SECRET?
BINGO!

Beyond the boundary

We justifiably take great pride in our democratic way of life and in the civil society that is the uniquely Canadian democracy: tolerant of differences, multicultural and compromise-oriented. As the celebrated journalist and social commentator Rex Murphy recently observed about our country: "There is a sense of grounded harmony [here] and there's some sense of outrage too if people walk beyond that." Two incidents came to light last week that, it is fair to say, stretched sensibilities far beyond what Murphy so poignantly called the "grounded harmony" of Canadian society.

Guy Bertrand, a noted Quebec lawyer, in all earnestness, asserted that the Supreme Court of Canada had become the victim of a Jewish conspiracy orchestrated by Justice Minister Irwin Cotler. As a result, Bertrand claimed, the court was incapable of adjudicating the case before it concerning his client, Leon Mugesera. The government wishes to deport Mugesera and his family. It alleges that he is a war criminal who was involved in the genocide of the Tutsis in Rwanda.

Bertrand's logic is the following: Cotler is a former head of the Canadian Jewish Congress. Irving Abella is a former head of the Canadian Jewish Congress. The Canadian Jewish Congress is an intervenor in the Mugesera case. Cotler nominated Abella's wife, Rosalie, to the Supreme Court of Canada. The entire court is therefore tainted by her appointment. That Madame Justice Abella will not be part of the court panel that hears the government's case against Mugasera next month matters not to Bertrand.

"The failure to withdraw from the nomination process," Bertrand alleged in his brief, "and to reveal all the truth can only lead a well-informed observer to conclude that unfortunately when are you are powerful, rich and influential like the [Canadian Jewish] Congress for example, you can infiltrate the court through political and judicial lobbying." Bertrand contends, according to the Globe and Mail, that "the dice are now loaded" and that "the Supreme Court cannot be impartial in the present case."

Bertrand's line of argument, as a Globe and Mail editorial thankfully pointed out, was nothing but "a pile of ridiculous and offensive non-sequitors." More importantly, the paper properly characterized Bertrand's brief to the court as "a pernicious attempt to disenfranchise a Jewish justice minister and a Jewish judge."

We commend the paper for so aptly pointing out the offence and the danger in Bertrand's argument.

The news of Bertrand's Supreme Court brief came on the heels of the news that the Université du Québec à Montréal felt compelled to cancel the speaking engagement of American Ambassador Paul Cellucci out of security concerns. Once again, as in the case of former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak and Concordia, the thugs who threaten violence have been given a veto over university protocol.

Neither of these two incidents threatens Murphy's "grounded harmony." But they seem part of a worrisome pattern of outrageous behaviours that step far beyond the boundaries that make our society civil.

Mere casualty count inappropriate

The letter from Bernard Katz (CJN, Nov. 11) about the number of Israeli and Palestinian deaths since the outbreak of the second intifadah presents a most troubling fallacy. The issue is not the objective, sad measurement and comparison of casualties, including minors. One must consider, to borrow a term from economics, the opportunity cost. Casualties inflicted by the Israel Defence Forces occur in the fight to protect lives. The issue is not solely how many casualties have occurred but also, and more importantly, how many lives have been saved as a result of these actions?

The casualties inflicted by the IDF have been done with the intent to save lives and have saved lives. Can the same be said about the deaths caused by terrorists?

Rabbi Benjamin Hecht
Toronto

Comparison between sides invalid

I have some advice for Bernard Katz (Letters, CJN, Nov. 11), who, in his letters about casualties during the second Palestinian intifadah, wrote that "Israel has failed to minimize innocent loss of life, especially as related to the killing of minors."

I suggest that he write a letter directly to Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Fatah and tell them to stop using Palestinian civilians, especially children, as human shields by "working" in their crowded apartment buildings and streets.

Has it occurred to Katz that Israel greatly regrets all civilian casualties and tries extremely hard to avoid them, if for no other reason than to avoid world media condemnation?

The difference between the two sides is that one is trying to maximize the death and injury of innocent civilians, while the other is trying to prevent them. I hope he can figure out which is which.

Arafat's funeral no honour

I am amazed at how many democratic nations sent representatives to Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's funeral, to stand next to leaders of Hamas, Hezbollah, Fatah and others like them. These terrorist group have been outlawed in Canada, yet we sent a delegation to this funeral. Would we also have sent a delegation to pay respects at a funeral for Adolf Hitler?

As the creator of modern terrorism, his hands dripping with the blood of thousands of guiltless men, women and children, Arafat should be categorized with the likes of Hitler and Stalin.

Harry Grunstein,
Montreal

Disagrees with Kirshner

In his Nov. 18 column ("Yasser Arafat was an ambivalent figure"), Sheldon Kirshner concludes that Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat "died too soon, an eternity too soon, as far as numerous Palestinians were concerned." Why didn't he write that Arafat died too late for the more than 1,000 of his victims who were murdered due to the unprecedented incitement by Arafat's official PA media and by Arafat himself, who extolled jihad and becoming a shahid (martyr)?

Kirshner writes further that Arafat's dream of Palestinian statehood is bound to be realized sooner or later. I disagree. Why should there ever be a Palestinian state if its rulers never come to terms with the Jewish state? The Palestinians don't deserve a state until they show that they have entered the civilized world and given up terrorism. If Arafat's funeral and the Palestinians' transfer of power after his death are any indication, they still have a long way to go.

Kirshner writes that Arafat's lasting legacy is his attempt to achieve Palestinian independence through dignity. I beg to differ. There was no dignity in the bloody way Arafat tried to achieve statehood through the killing of innocent men, women and children. Arafat's true legacy is the inculcation of murderous values in an entire generation of Palestinians to continue the fight of jihad against Israel.

Mordechai Bulua
Montreal

Nothing ambivalent about Arafat

Once again, Sheldon Kirshner has me wondering just whose side he's on. Even the headline of his rambling apology for Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat is a surprise ("Yasser Arafat was an ambivalent figure," Nov. 18).

There was nothing ambivalent about the man. From the very beginning, and until his very end, Arafat's single-minded aim was the destruction of Israel. He may have shown the face of peace to the Western world, but he never wavered in his quest for "all the land, from the river to the sea."

I find it strange that immediately after mentioning Arafat's call for a million martyrs on the march to Jerusalem and his proclaiming of the virtues of jihad, Kirshner tells us that "[h]e tolerated anti-Israel and anti-Jewish incitement in the Palestinian media and Palestinian schools." Televised calls for martyrs and jihad are seen as tolerance of incitement in the media? Given Arafat's stranglehold on every aspect of Palestinian society, you can be darn sure he did more than tolerate incitement in schools. He made it his official policy.

Kirshner tells us that Arafat "turned a blind eye to terrorism" and "was either unwilling or unable to staunch the tide of terrorism." Um, Mr. Kirshner, remember the documents the Israel Defence Forces found in Arafat's headquarters? You know, the ones with his signature on them, authorizing payments to terrorists, for terrorism? That's doing somewhat more than turning a blind eye, isn't it? And as for Arafat "obliquely praising suicide bombers," can you explain how calling suicide bombers heroes and martyrs can possibly be described as "oblique" praise?

By refusing to detail – or even outline – Arafat's full culpability, Kirshner inevitably shifts the blame to Israel. I would think there's more than enough of that going on in other media.

Most of all, though, I am profoundly disturbed that this whitewashing of a cold-blooded murderer appeared in a Jewish publication. Shame on The CJN.

With confluence of events, Bush seems primed for a Mideast push

By RON KAMPEAS

Colin Powell: out. Condoleezza Rice: in. Ariel Sharon: hanging on. Yasser Arafat: out forever. But the most important entry on Middle East watchers' list is U.S. President George W. Bush: in for four more years.

The recent death of Arafat, the Palestinian Authority president, creates an opportunity for the United States to influence events in the Middle East, and every one of Bush's decisions in recent days suggests that he is ready to flex his muscles.

He underlined his hopes for Palestinian statehood in his statement last week nominating Rice to replace Powell as U.S. secretary of state.

"We're pursuing a positive new direction to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict, an approach that honours the peaceful aspirations of the Palestinian people through a democratic state, and an approach that will ensure the security of our good friend, Israel," Bush said. "Meeting all of these objectives will require wise and skillful leadership at the Department of State, and Condi Rice is the right person for that challenge."

Bush also appointed Rice's deputy, Stephen Hadley, to replace her as national security adviser.

Both promotions suggest a tightening of an already close U.S.-Israel relationship. Powell had been the most powerful voice in the administration arguing for greater pressure on Sharon, the Israeli prime minister, to ease conditions for the Palestinians. It was often Rice who backpedalled on criticisms of Israel that were issued by Powell's State Department.

Hadley helped draft Bush's historic April 14 recognition of some Israeli claims to the West Bank and a rejection of the Palestinian demand that refugees be granted a "right of return" to their former homes in Israel.

Still, the significance of the appointments lies less in the pro-Israel credentials of Rice and Hadley than in the fact Bush wants to run an efficient foreign policy without the interagency tensions that marked his first administration.

"The degree of fighting between Defense and State made things impossible," William Kristol, editor of the conservative Weekly Standard, told last week's annual General Assembly of the United Jewish Communities, the umbrella organization of the North American Jewish federation system.

For Israel, a tighter ship in Washington means an even easier ride when the two nations are in agreement – and more pointed pressure when they are not.

Both Israel and its Arab neighbours would do well to heed advice from Rice, said Edward Walker, president of the Middle East Institute and a former assistant secretary of state for the Near East.

"Condi has great credibility in having the ear of the president," Walker said. "When she speaks, people will be listening as if the president is talking. She's not going to have the problems Powell had. She has the kind of identification and access Colin Powell never had."

Bush's administration already has made clear its short-term policy goals in the Middle East: a clean ride for the Palestinians toward Jan. 9 presidential elections.

Bush may be more willing to take chances with a new Palestinian leadership than he was with Arafat, whom Bush rejected for his ties to terrorism, Walker said.

The administration has warned Israel that it wants to see co-operation ahead of the Palestinian election, urging the Israeli army to pull back from Palestinian towns and villages and Israeli officials to allow Palestinians in eastern Jerusalem to vote.

"It's something that needs to be discussed further as we approach the Palestinian elections," State Department spokesperson Richard Boucher said last week about Jerusalem voters.

Bush also is determined to see Israel withdraw from the Gaza Strip next year, as Sharon has promised. Bush sees the pullout not as an end in itself but as a return to the U.S.-led "road map" peace plan and direct Israeli-Palestinian talks.

The pressure has had an effect.

"If in time we see that there is a Palestinian leadership that is willing to fight terror, we can have security co-ordination," Sharon said last week in a meeting with officials from his Likud Party, according to a Reuters report.

It was the most explicit signal from Sharon to date that he could return to direct talks after the Palestinian elections.

Even if Sharon chafes at such pressure, Bush's determination may have a salutary effect on Sharon's political prospects. No potential candidate for prime minister in Israel wants to be seen to be in direct conflict with Washington, and the clearer Bush's message has been, the more Sharon's potential challengers have fallen into line.

Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last week withdrew his threat to resign if Sharon did not put the Gaza withdrawal to a referendum. As well, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom softened his opposition to allowing eastern Jerusalem Palestinians to vote, telling the UJC General Assembly last week that there would be "no booths" in eastern Jerusalem but not ruling out a repeat of a mail-in voting system like the one used in 1996.

Palestinian officials liked Powell, but say they aren't disheartened by his departure. Instead, they're looking for more signals from Bush.

"It's not a question of individuals but a larger one of policy by the administration as a whole," Diana Buttu, a legal adviser to the Palestinian negotiating team, told JTA from Ramallah.

Rice's reputation as adamantly pro-Israel may be overblown, said Buttu, who dealt with the national security adviser during Bush's efforts to launch the road map in summer 2003.

Rice "got it" when Buttu's team presented her with a map showing expanded Jewish settlement in the West Bank and a projected route of the security fence that would have sliced up the area, Buttu said.

Intense U.S. pressure led Israel to change the route of the fence, bringing it closer to the pre-1967 boundary with the West Bank.

The Palestinian leadership is split between two views, Buttu said. One has it that Bush, freed from re-election considerations, will pressure Israel so that his legacy will include a peaceful settlement in the Middle East. The other view is that Bush is irrevocably pro-Israel.

Go with the latter, advises Tom Neumann, executive director of the Jewish Institute for National Security Affairs.

"George Bush has a commitment to Israel based on his own view of what the world is about," Neumann said.

In that view, Neumann said, support for Israel conforms with Bush's commitment to spreading democracy throughout the world.

Bush had already read Natan Sharansky's new book The Case For Democracy: The Power of Freedom to Overcome Tyranny and Terror when he invited the Israeli cabinet minister to meet last week.

Significantly, Rice told Sharansky she was reading the book too – on Bush's recommendation.

A parliament of the Jewish people

Hopes that the Zionist Congress would become the parliament of the Jewish people have not materialized. Instead, the World Zionist Organization (WZO) and its representative national Zionist federations have become irrelevant.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Hopes of turning the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) into a forum for authentic Jewish leadership have also come to naught. If the WZO is beset by petty party politics, JAFI is burdened by an obsolete structure. Jews have always survived and thrived on vision, passion and adherence to Judaism's fundamental tenets. There is little of these in either organization.

But JAFI seems to be aware of the problem. Hence the creation of its Institute for Jewish People Policy Planning. The institute's work points to the need for much closer, more intensive and symmetrical co-operation between Israel and the Diaspora.

The president of Israel and its minister for Diaspora affairs go further. They advocate the creation of a working parliament of the Jewish people. Though it cannot be democratically elected, it could be broadly representative. Its aim would be to articulate the challenges in the Jewish world today and act accordingly. I hope that its agenda will include:

- New initiatives in peace-making with the Palestinians with a direct bearing on Jewish life everywhere. Though the Knesset must, of course, remain sovereign, the new parliament could still have great influence in decision-making in Israel and on the diplomatic front abroad. Diaspora Jews are Israel's staunchest allies and her most trusted ambassadors.
- We must identify long-term needs, not just short-term measures. The parliament would formulate future plans, not only respond to present emergencies. Jews are hungry for direction and purpose. They are tired of clichés, old remedies and scare-mongering.
- Jewish education would be placed ahead of welfare in the service of imparting Jewish knowledge and promoting Jewish identity. We need to know who we are before we can act. Torah leads to action.
- The parliament would engage in intensive interfaith activities in the service of tikkun olam, helping to "mend the world." Exponents of the three Abrahamic faiths working together could perform near-miracles.
- The parliament would be respectful of all streams of Judaism, secular and religious. In its endeavour to stem intermarriage, it would promote conversion to Judaism of non-Jewish spouses and their children. Active outreach would replace grudging toleration.

The fact that these proposals are controversial is no reason to ignore them. The superficiality of our present semblance of communal unity is one of the reasons why many Jews choose to stay away. Pluralism that allows for differences but insists on mutual respect is a much healthier way to promote unity and identity. The new initiatives could help bring about both.

Infusing Shabbat with the spirit of Jerusalem

During my trip to Israel this past summer, I had the unique opportunity to spend 10 very special days living in the Jewish Quarter of the Old City of Jerusalem.

One of the things that impressed me was the chorus of different sounds that I heard within the city's wall. There, the sounds of three religions can be heard – Jewish children singing, playing and learning in Hebrew, church bells ringing, and the imam calling Muslims to prayer five times a day.

Jessica Apter in Vancouver

Eras, as well as faiths, meet in Jerusalem. The shouting of vendors to passing tourists, proclaiming the latest deals, and the back and forth bargaining that takes place in their small, crowded shops is interspersed with the persistent honking of cars and taxis as they try to manoeuvre through the narrow streets six days each week. Standing on the roof of the dormitory at which we were staying, I remember saying that I was looking out over the parking lot for the centre of the universe. And it really did feel that way.

It was on that seventh day in Jerusalem that I truly felt the gravity of the holy city. On Friday afternoon, I could feel the excitement of the approaching Shabbat all around me, and as I dressed up for dinner, I knew that it was not because I was trying to impress anyone else, but because the night itself was going to be special.

For the first time in my life, I felt a real desire to keep and fully experience Shabbat, so much so that despite the fact that it was my birthday, I followed the Shabbat custom of not discussing regular weekday matters. I even waited until Shabbat ended with Havdalah, overlooking the Western Wall, before discussing plans to go out into the city to celebrate my 21st. I was not the only one who felt that this day was different. Even my nicotine-addicted friends gave up smoking cigarettes for 25 hours and 26 minutes.

Now that I'm back at school, at Simon Fraser University in Burnaby, B.C., it is definitely harder to find the inspiration to keep the laws of Shabbat. However, there is a second part to Shabbat observance that requires us to remember the mitzvot in addition to keeping them.

While I'm not ready to resist the temptation to go out with my roommates on Friday nights or to give up precious essay-writing time on Saturday afternoons, and while kosher wine is hard to come by in Burnaby, there are some things that I can do to preserve Shabbat. Monthly Hillel Shabbat dinners at school are a treat, and in between, I can usually find a few Jewish – and sometimes some non-Jewish – friends and have Shabbat dinner with them on Friday evenings, at which we'll say the blessings on some wine and dinner rolls.

Jewish tradition says that God wants us to do the best that we can at fulfilling the mitzvot, and that we aren't expected to live up to standards of perfection, but instead to continually strive to be better Jews and to find meaning in the ways we do mitzvot.

For my Jewish friends at the university and for me, the distinction between Shabbat and the rest of the week may not occur in the most conventional of senses, but through our own Shabbat traditions, we celebrate the special night in a way that is meaningful for us.

It is through this that I can infuse my Friday nights in Vancouver with some of the spirit that I felt during my Shabbat in Jerusalem.

Derrida and the reality of philosophy

Last month, Jacques Derrida, the French Jewish philosopher heralded as the "Father of Deconstruction" passed away. The spectrum of eulogies after his death celebrated the achievements of his lifetime and condemned the supposed negative implications of his work, and the perilous position he took as a defender of his intellectual peer, Paul de Man, a Yale University professor who, in the 1980s, was exposed for having published vehemently anti-Semitic works as a young scholar in Paris before World War II.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

Derrida's influence pervades a course I am taking titled "Contemporary Continental Philosophy." But Derrida's biography, including his controversial defence of de Man, is as interesting to me as his philosophic accomplishments.

This year, in addition to reading Derrida and de Man, I have engaged with the texts of Edmund Husserl, Martin Heidegger, Hannah Arendt, and Walter Benjamin. While each is a great thinker in his or her own right, the common thread linking them – the influence of the Holocaust on their personal and professional lives – cannot be divorced from their thinking.

Edmund Husserl, the father of phenomenology, was an assimilated Jew who was forced from his academic post as a result of the Nuremberg laws. Martin Heidegger, Husserl's most promising student and a pure Aryan, took Husserl's position. In the late 1930s, he also removed Husserl's name from the dedication of his most famous work Being and Time.

Hannah Arendt was a young German Jew who studied under Heidegger and is known for her affair with him in the late 1920s. She fled Germany in the 1930s and ultimately sought refuge in America. Despite her knowledge of Heidegger's anti-Semitism, she travelled to Germany years after the Holocaust to visit her mentor.

Before Arendt could immigrate to America, she lived in France, where she met Walter Benjamin, a Jewish thinker who died trying to flee Nazi-occupied Germany. Benjamin's thought infuses Jewish messianism with Marxist revolutionary thinking, and it was Arendt who was predominantly responsible for compiling Benjamin's work and bringing it to America.

Derrida, an Algerian Jew, is often accused of stripping philosophy of its meaning. In questioning how we read that which is written, in coming to terms with the fact that the author may know little more than the reader of his work, Derrida is seen by many as tearing down the pillars of reason and truth leaving only a path toward relativism.

For Derrida, though, as for Arendt, Husserl, and Benjamin, the framework of reason and truth were torn down by history. They lived in incomprehensible times, when the depths of philosophic learning and knowledge could not even begin to answer the situations and circumstances they found themselves faced with.

As I try to engage in the texts these great thinkers produced, I find myself stuck from the outset. It is impossible, for me at least, to isolate their works from their lives, their philosophies from their realities.

As I read the obituaries condemning Derrida's philosophy and politics, I can't help but wonder how anyone can have the audacity to make such an argument. Derrida's philosophy challenges us to accept that the words on the page not only direct us to consider what resides in their content, but also what the words are unable to convey. The moment we think we have the answer, we have excluded an infinite horizon of possible meanings.

Though to some, this may be nothing more than a pretentious means of avoiding responsibility and reality, I believe that Derrida is responding in the only way he can. Philosophers are notorious for escaping the reality of the world for the idealism of the page, but in the case of Derrida and his contemporaries, this accusation cannot be fairly made. These thinkers grappled with the most incomprehensible of modern events.

It is one thing to critique Derrida's philosophy, and another to look at where his philosophy is coming from. Having to confront the thought of these great minds each day in class, I have come to see that considering their works is not simply a task in analytical reading and theoretical analysis. To understand their work is to understand the reality in which it is grounded – and that reality is one that cannot be easily understood, let alone conveyed.

The Kirshner File

Christian evangelicals line up behind Israel

George W. Bush coasted to victory in the Nov. 2 U.S. presidential election, defeating the Democratic contender, John Kerry, and virtually erasing the queasy memory of a president who squeaked into office four years ago on the strength of hanging chads and the unprecedented intervention of the Supreme Court in electoral politics. In no small measure, Bush owed his success to a highly religious and vocal group of voters who call themselves Christian evangelicals. By all accounts, three-quarters cast their ballots for Bush.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

These Christians, whose social and political conservatism generally mesh with Bush's agenda, supposedly form the largest and fastest growing bloc of pro-Israel sentiment in the United States. Ralph Reed, the former executive director of the Christian Coalition and the past chair of the Republican party in Georgia, claims that Israel is "probably the single most important foreign policy concern" to committed Christians like himself.

The bonds that bind them to Israel have deepened in the wake of the second Palestinian uprising, the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and the ongoing U.S. war on terror.

Animated by messianic fervour, Christian fundamentalists believe that biblical teachings oblige them to endorse Zionism and work for the return of Jews – God's chosen people – to the historic Land of Israel, from which they were driven by a succession of invaders. "The first thing we have to realize is that evangelical Christians take the Bible very seriously," the influential televangelist Pat Robertson explained recently.

He and like-minded Americans claim that Israel's conquest of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip in the 1967 Six Day War was part of a messianic process designed to hasten the so-called "end of days." In the aftermath of the Six Day War, Rev. L. Nelson Bell, a prominent evangelical thinker, declared that Israel's capture of the territories renewed his faith in the accuracy and validity of the Bible and his belief in God's "Divine Plan."

Such Christians regard the Bible as the literal word of God rather than as an allegory. In the Book of Luke, Jesus' disciples ask, "Lord, is this the time when you will restore the Kingdom of Israel?" And in Jeremiah 31:5, a passage reads: "Again you will plant vineyards on the hills of Samaria." In this spirit, they accept at face value God's promise to Abraham to give the Jewish People the Holy Land.

According to this school of biblical interpretation, Jesus, the messiah, will reappear in the Second Coming once Jews have returned en masse to their ancient ancestral homeland. Jews will then embrace Jesus and convert to Christianity. Jews who resist or deny Jesus will be destroyed in a final battle at Armageddon.

Evangelicals were a marginal phenomenon in Christianity when Israel was established in 1948. But in the past few decades, they have become a major force. Recognizing that they could be useful in a hostile world, Menachem Begin, Israel's first Likud prime minister, encouraged them to visit Israel. In 1981, after Israel's destruction of Iraq's nuclear reactor, Begin presented one of their dominant figures, Jerry Falwell of the Moral Majority, with an award named in honour of Vladimir Jabotinsky, the Zionist Revisionist theoretician. Begin's still more hawkish successor, Yitzhak Shamir, also cultivated this Christian Zionist constituency. Benjamin Netanyahu, the prime minister from 1996 to 1999, strengthened that budding and important relationship.

Confident that evangelicals share his outlook on the Arab-Israeli conflict, the current premier, Ariel Sharon, has bolstered ties with them as well. Last winter, Benny Elon, then Israel's minister of tourism and a representative of the far-right Moledet party, presented Robertson with a special award. Noting that 400,000 U.S. and European evangelicals had visited Israel in 2003, the third year of the intifadah, Elon observed, "We wanted to show our appreciation to the evangelical communities that did not abandon the streets of Jerusalem during the very difficult geo-political situation."

Pat Robertson

Bush, a born-again Christian who has been favourably disposed toward Israel, has always treated evangelicals deferentially. On his one and only trip to Israel in 1998 when he was governor of Texas, Bush confessed that he was overwhelmed by visits to sites commonly associated with Jesus. Although Bush has not publicly taken a theological position on Israel, he has formulated Mideast policies that closely correspond with Christianity's evangelical wing.

But to some Christian fundamentalists, even Bush is not sufficiently pro-Israel.

During a recent tour of Israel, Robertson – who has referred to the Muslim prophet Mohammed as a "killer" – warned Bush that his followers would bolt the Republican party should he "touch" Jerusalem. He meant that if the president comes out in favour of Jerusalem as the capital of both Israel and a Palestinian state, he would lose the backing of evangelicals.

Last year, when the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan was in vogue, 22 Christian fundamentalist leaders – ranging from Michael Little, the president of the Christian Broadcasting Network, to Paul Weyrich, the chair of the Free Congress Foundation – told Bush that it "could lead to disaster."

In a letter drafted by Gary Bauer, a former Republican presidential candidate and now head of the advocacy organization American Values, they argued: "It would be morally reprehensible for the United States to be 'even-handed' between democratic Israel, a reliable friend and ally that shares our values, and the terrorist-infested Palestinian infrastructure that refuses to accept the right of Israel to exist at all."

Shortly afterward, Robertson hammered home an identical message. The road map – which envisages a Palestinian state, with its capital in eastern Jerusalem – would spell "the beginning of the end of Israel." And in an audacious move, Robertson reportedly reprimanded Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom by saying, "Who do you think you are, handing over Jerusalem to Arafat?"

In accordance with his thinking, Robertson dismisses the legitimacy of the Palestinian claim to the West Bank and Gaza, describes the now-defunct Oslo peace process as "a tragic mistake" and criticizes the concessions that Ehud Barak, the former prime minister, offered at the Camp David summit in the summer of 2000. "Barak gave away the farm," he fumed.

Tom DeLay, the U.S. House majority leader and a Christian fundamentalist, holds similar views. He has expressed sharp disapproval of the road map, pressed the Bush administration to take a harder line with the Palestinians and requested an increase in Israel's aid package.

Much in the same vein, he has lambasted Egypt – a U.S. ally – for tolerating anti-Semitism in its media and failing to curb Palestinian arms smuggling into Gaza. When the Israeli army launched its controversial incursion into the Jenin refugee camp in April 2002, he staunchly defended Israel in a congressional resolution. DeLay explains that his passion for Israel stems from his admiration of its democratic values and his abiding Christian faith.

It would be fair to say that a substantial number of American Jews tacitly support Israel's dalliance with right-wing Christians like DeLay and Robertson. But it is also true that they are deeply suspicious of, and uncomfortable with, their ulterior motives, and disagree with their opposition to abortion, same-sex marriage and stem cell research.

George W. Bush

Writing in the Jewish Chronicle of London, Jonathan Freedland, a British Jewish journalist, commented, "We're making a grave mistake if we throw in our lot with the Christian right. On every count, these people are not our friends… We are expected either to convert to Christianity or to perish in the Apocalypse."

By way of elaboration, he added that the evangelical vision for Israel – the retention of the territories, come what may – spells disaster for Israel as a Jewish and democratic state. "No, these people are not our friends. They do not share U.S. Jewry's core values of tolerance and the separation of church and state, and they do not have Jews' long-term interests at heart."

Jews who support Israel's alliance with the Christian right say it is a tactical friendship and worth the risk. And citing a recent survey, they point out that only 35 per cent of evangelicals back Israel for strictly theological reasons. The rest, they say, have lined up behind Israel because it is a democracy and an ally of the United States.

Yet, the suspicion lingers on. As Leon Wieseltier, the literary editor of The New Republic, bluntly put it, "The evangelical Christians condescend to the Jews by offering their support before they convert or kill them."

Symposium examines issue of affordable housing

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Although one-third of Toronto's Jewish population now live in York Region, the availability of rental housing and support services are not keeping up with the growth, participants in a recent affordable housing symposium were told.

The focus of the symposium, sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Kehilla Residential Program and hosted by the Reena Foundation, was on providing affordable housing for seniors and those with special needs in the Jewish community, with an emphasis on York Region.

Kehilla, established in 1982, is the official housing agency of UJA Federation. The program's mission is to identify and champion affordable housing initiatives responsive to the needs of the Jewish community.

Its mandate is fulfilled through education and advocacy, project sponsorship, development consultation, research and management.

Kehilla has developed such buildings as The Marc Building with 450 residential units; the Avenel, which has 111 residential units; the Elm Ridge Seniors Group Living Residence, a 14-room seniors' group home; Habayit Shelanu, a 59-unit seniors' supportive residence; and 2 Neptune, a 120-unit seniors' life-lease building.

Emerging projects include the Kehilla Community Residential Building, a 63-unit community-agency-initiated supported housing project for the new Vaughan Community Campus, and a pilot community affordable rent program in collaboration with UJA Federation and a private landlord.

Keynote speaker David Zimmer, MPP for Willowdale and parliamentary assistant to the Attorney General Michael Bryant, told symposium participants that with some 300,000 people across the province on the social-housing waiting list, his government is committed to affordable housing. It was a major component of its platform going into the last election, he said.

"The government recognizes the need to develop and manage affordable housing, but the reality is that affordable housing requires money.

"We are faced with a choice – to keep a promise based on faulty information or slash vital services."

He is optimistic about creating housing, however, particularly since the federal government appears willing to negotiate a made-in-Ontario solution.

The federal government is tending to decentralize by passing down authority to the provinces, he said, "and that can be helpful to us. That power can dovetail nicely with the initiatives about which we have spoken."

Andy Stein, senior policy adviser to David Caplan, minister of public infrastructure renewal, said that since Canada and Ontario signed the Affordable Housing Program Agreement in 2003, 2,389 units in 41 projects have been announced across the province. "The province wants to meet a commitment for 20,000 new units, and target people unable to enter the private market."

Delivering affordable housing is an extremely complex issue, said UJA Vaughan Campus development manager, David Sadowski. "There is no simple answer or a single target group.

"If we are serious about delivering affordable housing [we need] a shift in thinking."

His initial premise is to "forget about the private sector; it is in business for profit and is not a viable source for affordable housing."

The corollary, he said, would be to turn to the public sector. "The public sector has the obligation and the ability to deliver affordable housing, and it has the resources to do it."

The city owns more than 26 million square feet of buildings and thousands of acres of land, he said, and the Toronto District School Board (TDSB) owns more than $5 billion worth of property.

"Those are staggering numbers. If 10 per cent of those sites could accommodate affordable housing, suddenly we would have 200 sites."

Adjacent to the Downsview subway station is a 65-acre site, he said. "It has been sitting like that for years, and TDSB has owned Bathurst Heights Secondary School for years. To the school board's credit, it actually wants to do something with the site. "

There are so many sites undeveloped and available that "I can think of 10 more [examples] off the top of my head."

Sylvia Patterson, director of housing and residential services in York Region, said that things in York Region "are the same but different.

"We are living in a young community now, but it will not be young in 2026. We will be looking for changes in housing."

There are 6,000 people on the waiting list for housing in York Region, a jump of 5,000 households in five years, she said.

The region needs an ongoing program that will recognize the needs of the local community. "We are exhausted by one-hit wonders."

Sandy Keshen, Reena's executive director, called inclusion and full citizenship "the mantra for various supportive communities.

"People need to feel part of, not an add-on to community projects. Fifty years ago, people with developmental disabilities were invisible. There were few in the school and few in the neighbourhood.

"That has changed, but it has been slow. Another 4,000 people will be coming out of institutions in the next four years and we need to plan for them. They will need more than a bed and a roof."

Also speaking were Sheila Smyth, director, Terrace of Baycrest, Wagman Centre and Elm Ridge, who talked about seniors housing needs and aging in place, and Nancy Singer, Kehilla's executive director.

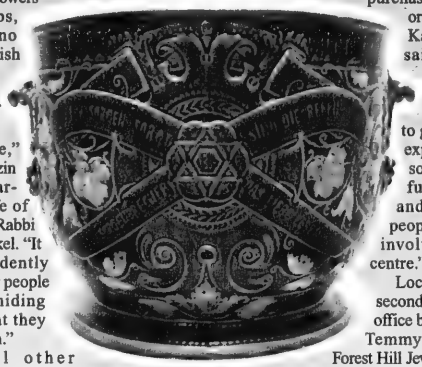
Rare Judaica to be auctioned for Temmy Latner Centre

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

A rare Judaica silver cup on a stand with various secret compartments, hiding a kiddush cup, menorah, havdalah set and engraving of Jerusalem, is one of many donated works of art slated for auction next week in aid of the Temmy Latner Forest Hill Jewish Centre.

The foot-tall piece, which resembles a silver trophy cup, is outwardly decorated with flowers and cherubs, but with no telltale Jewish symbols. "It's apparently of Marrano provenance," said Rebbetzin Rifky Karfunkel, wife of the centre's Rabbi Elie Karfunkel. "It was evidently designed for people who were hiding the fact that they were Jewish."



One of many items to be auctioned off.

Several other valuable pieces of Judaica are among the art works to be offered in the centre's Rare Treasure and Art Auction, slated for the Blue Dot Gallery in Toronto's Distillery Historic District on Dec. 2.

About three-quarters of the pieces in the auction were donated by Robert Kaplan, the former Liberal Member of Parliament and his wife, Estherelke, who have been supporters of the small but growing congregation for years. "They chose a cause that they feel strongly about," said their son, John, who is also involved with the centre, which is located on Spadina Road, near Lonsdale Road, in Forest Hill Village.

The Kaplans donated an assortment of items with a collective appraised value of about $75,000. Included are the silver cup, which has been appraised at almost $18,000, as well as a pair of early 19th-century Chinese blue and white porcelain baluster vases, a pair of Chinese Ming-dynasty ceramic figurines and a 19th-century German Jewish majolica wine vessel with a Star of David decoration.

The centre received several other donations of art, including oil paintings by local artist Estair Kaufman, who produces street scenes depicting the neighbourhood of Jerusalem's Holy Temple in the Second Temple period. Silver mezuzot, menorahs, crystal vases and donated works by other local artists are also among the items to be offered by live and silent auction.

Despite the apparent inclusion of many "high ticket" items costing thousands of dollars, the Karfunkels insist that some pieces will likely go for moderate sums "in the low hundreds."

"It will probably be a really enjoyable social evening that everyone can attend, whether they're planning to purchase anything or not," Rifky Karfunkel said. "It's really just a nice way for people to get out and experience some beautiful Judaica and meet people who are involved in the centre."

Located on the second floor of an office building, the Temmy Latner Forest Hill Jewish Centre began as a learning centre in the early 1990s. An initiative of Ohr Somayach/Tanenbaum College International, it received much of its funding from philanthropists Albert J. Latner, in memory of his late wife Temmy Latner, and Joseph Tanenbaum, the father of Estherelke Kaplan.

The Karfunkels arrived at the centre about five years ago and soon opened the synagogue. Its present membership is about 60 families and growing. The centre boasts an enthusiastic and close-knit congregation in which young and old happily mingle and learn from one another, the Karfunkels say. It also offers a weekly Hebrew school from grades 1 to 6.

The Rare Treasure and Art Auction is the first event of its type that the centre has hosted. Money raised "will be used to enhance the programs we're already running," Rabbi Karfunkel said. "We're also looking to build and expand our premises."

The Rare Treasure and Art Auction takes place Dec. 2 at the Blue Dot Gallery, 55 Mill St., Building 47, in the Distillery Historic District. The preview and reception begin at 7 p.m. and the live auction at 9 p.m. The couvert is $25. For more information, please call 416-483-0883.

Jewish Life

Jews of the Caribbean

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

It is not commonly known that Sephardim were the first Jews in the Americas. They were not only the first to arrive, they were also the first to build communities.

This year, the Nidhe Israel Synagogue of Bridgetown in Barbados celebrates 350 years of Jewish worship. In Curacao, in the Netherlands Antilles, is yet another congregation, Mikveh Israel, which was founded in the year 1651. Proving that shul politics exist even in paradise, both congregations stake their claim to being the oldest in the Western Hemisphere. They are indeed older than other historic synagogues, not just in the Americas but in Britain as well. On another Caribbean island, St. Thomas in the U.S. Virgin Islands, stands congregation Bracha V'shalom V'gemilut Chassidim. It was founded in 1796.

Through A Sephardi Window

The synagogues in these beautiful but unlikely places were founded by Jews who specifically sought the distance of the New World. It was their desire to leave the European continent and establish themselves in a far-off place where they could live their lives with religious freedom.

Their experience was very similar in many ways to that of the American Pilgrims. Theirs was both an escape and an adventure, fraught with the dangers of the sea and of the unknown, with hardships, disease and hunger. Like the Pilgrims, they persevered and succeeded.

These were Jews of Spanish and Portuguese decent who integrated themselves into the development of the Caribbean islands. The Judeo/Spanish names on the tombstones of their respective centuries-old cemeteries can still be found in local telephone directories.

Today, the synagogue buildings stand prominently in the centres of their towns. The one in Barbados is located on Synagogue Lane just off the main street. Similarly, St. Thomas' synagogue is on Synagogue Hill. Evidently, the synagogues existed before the streets did and the streets and neighbourhoods took on their names.

The presence of the synagogues is well-recognized by all the locals in a mater-of-fact way and is very much a part of the islands' legacies.

Although these communities always remained small, their relative importance was recognized beyond their proportions.

In 1831, after a tropical hurricane destroyed most of the Barbados synagogue, it was rebuilt and rededicated. The rededication of the present building was reported in the April 1, 1833 edition of the Barbados Globe.

"Friday last was a day that will ever stand eminently distinguished in the annals of the Hebrew community of this town. The Jews, from the earliest settlements of the island have been established among us and may truly be said to have always been a useful and valuable branch of our commercial, industry and enterprise... there is indeed no portion of our civil, political, or religious institutions in which they have not contributed to improve, or benefit... to them and their liberality there is no charitable association which is not deeply indebted... regarding them, as we do, to be the kind neighbours, warm friends and good citizens, we can not but respect them as such."

More links in the unbroken chain

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Dr. Neil Rosenstein, a 60-year-old New Jersey genealogist and surgeon, has produced a groundbreaking genealogical study of a highly notable Jewish family, the Luries, that was published as an attractive coffee-table book recently by the New Jersey-based genealogical publishing house, Avotaynu.

Roots & Remembrance

The Lurie Legacy focuses on the medieval lineage arising from Rabbi Jehiel Lurie, head of the 13th-century rabbinical court in Brest-Litovsk. Besides tracing select family branches to the present, the book traces a connection to Rashi, the 11th-century sage, and continues backward in time to such towering Jewish figures as Hillel and Hezekiah – and ultimately King David.

The work links the Luries to the legendary 16th-century Rabbi Meir Katzenellenbogen of Padua, whose descendants gave rise to the Ger, Bobov and other major chassidic dynasties of 18th-century Europe, an extensive family tree that was the subject of Rosenstein's monumental 1990 opus, The Unbroken Chain.

In a foreword, former Israeli Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau unequivocally endorses the validity of the biblical-era links. In its 1999 edition, the Guinness Book of Records also accepts the Luries as the oldest-known living family in the world today.

Regarded as the most prominent and ancient of all Ashkenazi families, the clan apparently originated in 13th-century France. An obscure tradition associates the name with the Hebrew phrase "le-or Yah" ("by God's light"), but Rosenstein suggests it derived from the name of the town of Loire on the Rhone River.

The tree boasts an astonishing array of historical figures from the prophet Isaiah to Sir Isaiah Berlin, Felix Mendelssohn to Karl Marx, Martin Buber to Moses Montefiore. Others include Sigmund Freud, Yehudi Menuhin, Helena Rubinstein, the Rothschilds, even Rosenstein himself. If it begins to sound like a "Who's Who" of the Ashkenazi world, that's because it is. Rosenstein asserts the tree may connect "most, if not all" Ashkenazi Jews alive today.

The book recounts many historical anecdotes, including the unverified tale of the legendary Elchanan, a cousin of Rashi's who supposedly converted and became the Roman Catholic Pope Andreas. A more central anecdote involves Yoneh Lurie of Moghilev, whose minchah prayer was interrupted one afternoon in 1812 by Napoleon, whose army had just been defeated.

Yoneh assisted the emperor and received his gold-embroidered great-coat as a token of appreciation. The jacket was later fashioned into a parochet, a curtain for the holy ark, that now belongs to the Haifa Museum.

The book presents numerous rare and previously unpublished documents, including a 19th-century family pedigree by Simcha Lurie of Minsk, nephew of the talmudist Rabbi David Lurie (the "Radal"). Through diligent presentation of original sources, Rosenstein says he hopes to reverse several longstanding mistakes and textual misreadings.

Illustrious personages bearing variants of the name include the Nobel Prize-winning Italian physician Salvador Luria (1912-1991) and internationally renowned political cartoonist Ranan Lurie, who penned the book's preface. However, 16th-century kabbalist Rabbi Isaac Lurie of Safed (the "Ari") is one of numerous prominent Luries who cannot yet be connected to the clan with historical accuracy.

Another is Rebecca Lipa Anikster, whose unique 19th-century Yiddish-Hebrew autobiography Zecher Olam is painstakingly reproduced and translated in the book. Rosenstein is still awaiting new evidence that will determine her branch of the family with precision.

Of course, it's the mark of a mature genealogist to recognize that not all mysteries can be solved. "Sometimes there will be things that will not have an answer," he said. "In such cases, we can only say 'Taku' just as we do sometimes when reading the Talmud. 'Taku' means we have to wait for Eliyahu the Prophet to come along to tell us what is the right answer."

Jewish Life

'What does being Jewish mean to me?'

I Am Jewish: Personal Reflections Inspired By the Last Words of Daniel Pearl*, edited by Judea and Ruth Pearl, Jewish Lights Publishing.

Brutally murdered in Pakistan, Wall Street journalist Daniel Pearl uttered words that stirred Jews everywhere: "My father is Jewish, my mother is Jewish, I am Jewish."

In this volume, about 150 Jewish personalities – scholars, politicians, rabbis and entertainers – offer their responses to the question: "What does being Jewish mean to me?"

Books
Bernard Baskin

The answers, which are never more than a page or two in length, cover a wide gamut of ideas, feelings and sentiments.

Irwin Cotler, Canadian justice minister: "In a word, if I can paraphrase my parents' teaching, the Jewish People are among the only people in the world today who still inhabit the same land, embrace the same religion, study the same Torah, speak the same aboriginal language – Hebrew – and bear the same name – Israel – as we did 3,500 years ago. I am a Jew. My mother is a Jew. My father is a Jew. We all met at Sinai."

Norman Lear, writer and television producer: "I identify with everything in life as a Jew. The Jewish contribution over the centuries to literature, art, science, theatre… fills me with pride… As to Judaism, the religion: I love the congregation and find myself less interested in the ritual. If that describes me to others as a 'cultural Jew,' I have failed myself. My description, as I feel it, would be 'total Jew.'"

Rabbi Sandy Sasso, the second woman to be ordained: "We hold in tension our two questions to God: "Will not the Judge of all the earth do justly?" and "I lift up my eyes to the mountains, from where will my help come?" With one hand we shake a fist, demanding a world that is kinder and more just… With the other hand, we reach out to find compassion in the knowledge of God's eternal embrace. We find refuge in the shelter of God, in the belief that we are not alone in the universe and that we can reshape tomorrow."

Robert Rabinovitch, president and CEO of CBC: "To accept being Jewish, to be proud of one's Jewish heritage, is the critical step in understanding oneself and in focusing a role in public life… My responsibility is to serve all Canadians. My Jewish roots give me the core values necessary to respect, and work for, all Canadians."

Eric Yoffe, rabbi, president of the Union for Reform Judaism: "The Jewish people are a contentious lot, and my fellow Jews infuriate me more often than not, but I am bound to them nonetheless. Just as I do not like all the members of my family, but I am obligated to love them, so too do I love the Jewish people…"

Alan Dershowitz, law professor, Harvard University: "I love the Jewish Bible, Talmud and other sacred texts, but I study them as metaphor… on the Jewish experience, written by fallible human beings… It has been these books that have encouraged me to challenge everything… They have also encouraged me to challenge all secular truths and accepted wisdom. Judaism is a tradition of challenge – of questioning, of doubting, of debating, and of living with uncertainty. Being a Jew means always living with uncertainty – never letting one's guard completely down."

Ruth Bader Ginsburg, U.S. Supreme Court judge: "A question stated in various ways is indicative of what I would like to convey. What is the difference between a New York City garment district bookkeeper and a Supreme Court justice? [In] one generation my life bears witness [of] the difference between the opportunities open to my mother, a bookkeeper, and those open to me. I am a judge, born, raised, and proud of being a Jew. The demand for justice runs through the entirety of Jewish history and Jewish tradition. I hope, in all the years I have the good fortune to serve on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, I will have the strength and courage to remain steadfast in the service of that demand."

Music sites for Chanukah

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Chanukah is on the way and that means so are a whole slew of traditional holiday songs. For those of you who'd like to brush up on the classics, while learning a few that will have bubbie doing a double-take, I present "Eight Music Sites for Eight Chanukah Nights."

Night No. 1: The Jewish National & University Library in Jerusalem has put together a marvellous website that preserves the sounds and songs of Jewish communities from around the world. Make this your first stop if you want to practise your menorah blessings or find a new melody to an old song. There are five versions for the menorah candle-lighting ceremony (Ashkenazi, Carlebach-style, Hungarian, Algerian and Sephardi) with other Chanukah songs from Algeria, France, Turkey, Italy and the lovely Ir Kleyne Likhtelekh (Oh, You Little Candles) in Yiddish. [http://jnul.huji.ac.il/dl/music/hanukkah/]

Night No. 2: Stop off at the Aish HaTorah site for the lyrics to popular tunes like Chanukah Oh Chanukah, Sevivon Sov Sov Sov and I Have a Little Dreidel. You can then check out some of the new songs on the same page. [http://tinyurl.com/5jfmt] Here's a bonus link to more songs: [http://tinyurl.com/6wys3]

Night No. 3: Tonight it's time for something different. Reggae Chanukah mixes Caribbean rhythms, traditional Ghanaian dance drumming, Middle Eastern instruments and "batteries of Brazilian and Latin percussion as samba meets mambo for some salsa on their latkes." Although many of the songs are new, you'll recognize familiar melodies peeking through the reggae Maoz Tzur and the West African dance-drumming Gota medley (Hanerot Halalu; S'veevon; Chanukah, Oh Chanukah). The entire album can be previewed online. [www.reggaechanukah.com/RCmusic.htm]

Night No. 4: Tired of performing your Chanukah songs a cappella? Then download sheet music to Maoz Tzur, Mi Yemalel (Who Can Retell) and more. [http://tinyurl.com/5fbv8]

Night No. 5: One of the most famous songs associated with the holiday is Handel's Judas Maccabeus. The oratorio celebrates the victories of the ancient Jewish loyalists against their pagan foes. Eliezer Segal examines how one of Handel's themes, See the Conquering Hero Comes, has been adopted by Jews as a Chanukah melody. According to Segal, the irony is that when Handel composed Judas Maccabeus, he was more concerned that it become a "pageant of English patriotism rather than a source of Jewish national pride." The tune will play as you enter the website. [http://tinyurl.com/4su62]

Night No. 6: Every year when Chanukah rolls around, Jewish folk songs begin to fill Lesley's head. As she recounts in her House of Plum blog, some of the songs are holiday-related, such as the Klezmer Conservatory Band's Oy Chanukah, Oy Chanukah, but more are such classics as Theodore Bikel's Tumbalalayka and the Barry Sisters' Chiribim Chiribom. You can listen to these delightful songs by clicking on the eight menorahs while reading Lesley's Chanukah 2003 commentary. [http://tinyurl.com/4qrdk]

Night No. 7: They're classics in Israel and they can be in your home, too. If you can read Hebrew, I think you'll appreciate the Chagim website. You'll find the lyrics to more than 20 Hebrew Chanukah songs including Ner Li (I Have a flame), Levivot (Latkes) and Nes Chanukah (Miracle of Chanukah). [www.chagim.org.il/chsongs.html]

Night No. 8: Everybody's favourite little dreidel is, of course, made of clay. But if you want a new dreidel to sing about, look no further than the Hava Nashira Jewish Songleader's Resource. There are dozens of modern variations of the classic, including:

- I have a little dreidel, I made it from cement/ And now our lovely hardwood floor has a nasty dent.
- I have a little dreidel, I made it out of glue/ The baby tried to spin it, and now she's spinning, too.
- I have a little dreidel, made from a CD-ROM/ It helped me launch a startup Called DreidelSpin-dot-com! [http://uahc.org/hanashir/dreidl.htm]

Republicans make inroads among Jewish voters

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jews inclined to religious observance joined practicing Roman Catholics, Southern Baptists and Episcopalians in throwing their support behind President George W. Bush during the Nov. 2 U.S. election, according to the editor of an influential American political magazine.

Peter Beinart, editor of the Washington-based The New Republic, said post-election research showed that an estimated 69 per cent of Orthodox Jews cast their ballots for Bush, and altogether, about 25 per cent of Jewish voters supported the Republican president.

Beinart said voting preferences were correlated with the level of religious observance and not with religious affiliation. The more religious the voter, the more likely to vote for the president. That breaks with a trend set in the 1970s when Catholics and Southern Baptists tended to vote Republican. Today those who identify with those faith groups but are not church-goers tended to support the Democratic nominee, Sen. John Kerry, he said.

Beinart was in Toronto recently as a guest of the Canada-Israel Committee, the Jewish community's primary lobbying arm on issues related to Israel.

In an interview with The CJN, he suggested Orthodox Jews, though comprising only 10 per cent of the country's Jewish population, played an important role in the election. Despite their small numbers, Jewish voters could be found in strategically important locations, such as south Florida, the suburbs of Cleveland, in Pennsylvania and New Jersey.

Motivated by Bush's pro-Israel policies, their support for school vouchers and their opposition to same sex marriage, Orthodox Jews turned out in large numbers. The Bush campaign skillfully exploited the cleavages within the Jewish community on these issues, he said.

Peter Beinart

Other elements in the Jewish community also moved to the Republicans, among them Russian Jews and younger Jews. This generation has less of an emotional attachment to the Democratic party than their parents, are less likely to be employed by the state, have fewer ties to unions and are more likely to be self-employed in business. That naturally brings them into the Republican orbit, he said.

Younger male Jews are also more likely than women to be hawks on foreign policy and more resentful of high taxes. On the other hand, Jewish women, like other college-educated women, are strongly pro-choice and therefore more likely to vote for the Democrats, he said.

Beinart speculated that young Jews will continue to provide "another area of opportunity for the Republicans, along with the Orthodox," and emulate Hispanic voters, who have moved from the Democrats to the Republicans in large numbers. Beinart estimated that as many as one-third of Jewish voters could throw their support to the Republicans, reminiscent of the level of support Republican President Ronald Reagan received in the 1980s.

Responding to speculation that the Republicans might tap Democratic Senator Joseph Lieberman for a cabinet position, Beinart suggested the move could help the administration sell its Iraq policy more broadly. Working against that possibility is the administration's strong emphasis on loyalty and their concern they could not control the one-time vice-presidential nominee.

Turning to the Middle East, Beinart said the United States has no interest in seeing chaos develop in the Palestinian territories in the run-up to their election. The administration would like to see people committed to the peace process win, among them former Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas, Mohammed Dahlan, former security chief in Gaza and Salam Fayad, the Palestinian Authority's finance minister.

Don't discount the desire of the Bush administration to improve on the progress made under former president Bill Clinton. "You can't underestimate the desire of the Bush administration to show up Clinton," he said.

The United States possesses several tools that could help the Palestinians conduct their election. It can provide the Palestinians financial support; it can prevail upon Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to withdraw troops from checkpoints to allow easier movements for Palestinians; and it can urge Israel to permit residents of East Jerusalem to vote.

Beinart suggested the United States would like to see Abbas prevail and create a unified leadership that would broaden the political process by including Hamas and other militias.

NCSY concert draws multi-generational audience

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Showcasing a diverse mix of contemporary Jewish music, the performers at the 24th annual National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) concert played to a sold-out audience recently at the Toronto Centre for Performing Arts.

The concert honoured Ronnie and Chana Rutman, recipients of the 2004 OU/NCSY national business leadership award.

Burgeoning star soprano Jakie Young, famed guitarist Yossi Piamenta, the Shalsheles band and singer Shloime Dachs were the main acts, along with the Nafshenu Orchestra.

Young singers Ariel Shields and Shmuel Weiss also took to the stage.

"That kid [Young] is better than me," is how Piamenta introduced himself to fans, who were energized not only by his humour, but by the musician's behind-the-back guitar playing and catchy tunes.

Piamenta's rendition of Asher Bora, resembling the popular song Down Under by Men at Work, captivated the crowd.

"He adds a rock essence to Jewish music," said Reena Gelberger, 21.

"He's an amazing guitar player."

Billed as "the largest entertainment event in the Toronto Jewish community," the concert attracted a multi-generational audience, from young children to seniors.

"This is a Toronto tradition," said Robert Balis, a 15-year-old student at Ohr Chaim Bnei Akiva, who added that the majority of students from his high school were in attendance.

Between performances, video clips of current and NCSY alumni members were shown.

NCSY regional director Rabbi Glenn Black spoke about the organization's successful efforts in reversing the trends toward intermarriage and an absence of Jewish affiliation, particularly among young people.

NCSY is "re-igniting the fading flame [young people] never knew they had," he told the audience.

Rabbi Black cited a North American study of NCSY alumni that shows 58 per cent are more observant today compared to how they were raised and 98 per cent have Jewish spouses.

He emphasized that NCSY attracts Jewish youth from both public and parochial schools.

He noted 275 public high school students in the Greater Toronto Area attend the organization's Torah High School and 350 kids participate weekly in Jewish Culture Clubs in public schools.

Before the concert, a gala dinner was held to honour the Rutmans, who are active members of the Jewish community.

Ronnie, a chartered accountant and partner at Zeifman & Company, serves on the boards of Zareinu and Canadian Friends of Yad Sara and Chana is involved with Zareinu, Bikur Cholim and Sunnybrook Hospital.

The award recognizes the Rutmans for "exemplary conduct and successful accomplishments in the business world, as well as a commitment to Jewish life and the well-being of the Jewish community, both in Canada and in Israel."

Feintuchs have built their lives around BAYT

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

When Thornhill residents Jack and Harriet Feintuch were being interviewed for Canadian citizenship, the judge closed their file, looked at them seriously, and said, "I've spoken to people from Pakistan, India, Africa – all over the world. But I've never dealt with people from the Bronx."

The Feintuchs were not surprised at the implication that the Bronx is a less than desirable place to come from. They were both born in the Bronx, "at the same hospital, two months apart," Jack noted, and grew up there "when it was still a nice place to live."

The couple have made their lives in the new Thornhill community, a life that especially revolves around Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation. They were among the first dozen families in the synagogue, and have remained active there. Now, the synagogue has honoured them with a gala dinner, a sold-out affair held this week.

They have fond memories of the pioneering days of BAYT, as it is affectionately called. They were at the first Slichot service, which was held in the rabbi's basement, and where the first tentative social circles were formed. Jack remembers on the morning before Rosh Hashanah looking at the workmen painting, plastering, carpeting and doing other basic building tasks, and worrying that the place wouldn't be ready for services. It was.

Through the years, the Feintuchs were an integral part of the functioning of the shul. Jack helped out when the library was flooded (several times). He joined the minyanim every day (BAYT is one of the few synagogues to have had a daily minyan since its inception), attended shiurim and served on a rotating panel of gabbais. He often leads the services.

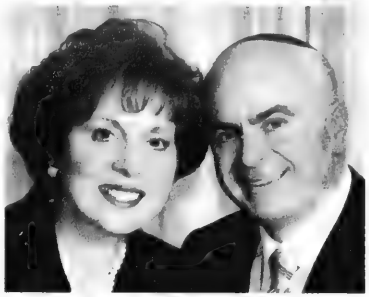
Harriet, although busy with two young children, helped found the sisterhood. Together with other women of the congregation, she rotated babysitting assignments and served kiddushes. She organized the first shul picnic and ran a highly successful fundraising lottery.

They served on many committees, both in the original building on Bevshire Circle, and the permanent one on Clark Avenue, Jack served as chairman of the board (until his death, shul benefactor Joseph Tanenbaum was president) during the first two years of the new facility, was a vice-president and board member for a number of years, and was on a task force on getting young people involved in the synagogue.

"We did whatever was needed, and whatever they asked us to do," they agreed.

Both Harriet and Jack credit the example of their parents for their continuing and dedicated service.

Jack is the son of Holocaust survivors. "They have the Holocaust mentality, that you have to help each other," he said. Harriet grew up in a single-parent home, where "we had to help each other. I learned that you don't just sit by."



Harriet and Jack Feintuch

Rabbi Baruch Taub, the founding spiritual leader of BAYT, said that "their lives are guided by the principles of a shul in the classic model of the European Jewish community. It is their second home, and they build their lives around the shul."

Jack is executive vice-president of Runnymede Development. Harriet now spends a lot of time with their grandchildren.

They still have dreams for the shul. Jack wants to ensure the "financial integrity. We shouldn't be desperate when we have to fix something, or want to enhance what is going on there." An endowment fund might be the answer, he suggested.

Harriet is more concerned about outreach, especially to young people. "We should do something about drugs, and try to help kids who have fallen between the cracks."

One of the outcomes of the dinner for them will be the dedication of the omed, the prayer stand, in the synagogue, to the memory of Jack's father, a frequent visitor to the synagogue, and one who loved to lead the services, and took the responsibility very seriously.

The Feintuchs are a little embarrassed by all the attention, insisting that they have gotten so much from BAYT. Jack said that "the friends [we have made in the synagogue] have become our extended family. We know that we can count on each other."

The shul is precious to them. Jack said that "we feel that we are involved in something significant, something that will last a long time. It reinforces everything we believe in and fight for."

Halachah said to change over time

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Halachah, Jewish law, has always been able to confront new situations, face challenges and find solutions within normative parameters, says Rabbi Daniel Sperber, president of the Institute of Advanced Torah Learning at Bar-Ilan University and winner of the prestigious Israel Prize.

"Even radical innovations have been totally accepted by the rabbinical world," he said at Beth Jacob V'Anshei Drildz Congregation, in a lecture for Torah In Motion, an organization that stresses the relationship between Torah and the modern world.

While there are certainly many immutable rules, including laws with abiding significance such as the laws of kashrut, the halachic world has also recognized the constantly changing face of society, Rabbi Sperber said.

The prosbul, which allowed debts to be carried over during a jubilee year, and the heter iska, allowing interest, are examples of changes to the law that "not only are we surprised that [nearly] everyone accepted at the time, but now are taken for granted," he said.

The rabbi cited several examples of a total change in what is allowable in the Orthodox world in regards to what women can and can't (or shouldn't) do.

Traditionally, he said, there was little place for women scholars. Ironically, it was the haredi world that started the push towards women's education, when Sarah Schneirer founded the Bais Yaakov school system in which women studied Torah.

"With women more active in society and a downward spiral in religiosity" in the general Jewish community, Rabbi Sperber said, it was seen as imperative that women have the education themselves to be able to teach their children.

Thirty years ago, he said, there was no framework for women to study Gemarah. Then, "a few brave souls" took the initiative, and now there are 60 institutions in Israel alone where thousands of women study all aspects of Jewish learning.

What is even more surprising, Rabbi Sperber said, is that "no one seems upset by it."

There are even women advocates, whom the rabbis allow to plead before a beit din, and even make halachic rulings on certain aspects of law that relate to women.

In the 1880s, Rabbi Sperber said, a prominent European rabbi visiting the United States was asked whether it was allowed, according to Jewish law, to have a celebration for a girl turning 12. His answer was that not only was it contrary to biblical law, but it was "hateful and disgusting."

Yet, recently, Rabbi Ovadia Yoseph, former chief rabbi of Israel, ruled that "just as one says a brachah [blessing] at a son's bar mitzvah in the synagogue, so one should say it for a daughter." In other words, the event is a mitzvah. A complete change from "hateful" to a "mitzvah."

The real issue, Rabbi Sperber said, is the true intention of those who want such innovations. "Is it l'shem shomayim, for the sake of heaven [a spiritual need], or is it for political reasons, or to copy what others are doing?"

This quandary is central to the question of whether women can say Kaddish in the synagogue. Rabbi Aaron Soloveitchik "realized that there was no halachic reason to forbid it," Rabbi Sperber said.

Rabbi Ovadia Yoseph said that those who have a genuine personal need to say Kaddish should do so, as to forbid it would cause the mourner pain.

Preventing mental anguish and maintaining a person's dignity is a basic concept in Jewish law, Rabbi Sperber said. If a woman has a genuine spiritual need to say Kaddish, forbidding her to do it would cause her mental anguish.

> 'Even radical innovations have been totally accepted by the rabbinical world'

The decisions, he insisted, must be arrived at after careful, intelligent discussion and consideration, he said.

"If rabbis are outspoken, creative and intelligent, they will come up with halachically acceptable and humanly acceptable solutions."

The question of a mechitzah, a physical separation of men and women in synagogue, is "a complicated one," Rabbi Sperber said. He explained that there was no clear separation in the Temple, except for Sukkot, "because [during that festive holiday] the men went nuts."

In medieval times, the women prayed in a completely separate room, such as in the Old-New Shul in Prague. "The issue isn't even mentioned in the Shulchan Aruch because it wasn't an issue – the women were in a separate room."

The problem started in Renaissance Italy, where women were brought into the synagogue, and the first balconies appeared.

For the last 150 years, the rabbi said, separate seating has been mandatory in Orthodox synagogues (all the more since mixed seating is allowed in Conservative and Reform synagogues, he added dryly).

He summed up his own dilemma: "As a historian and an academic, I realize that mixed seating is allowed [halachically]. As an Orthodox rabbi, I would have considerable difficulty with it."

Canada's funding of UNRWA still a problem

Agency for Palestinian Refugee in the Near East (UNRWA), estimated at $10 million a year, despite last month's explosive admission by the agency's head that members of Hamas are on its payroll.

A report last week by the U.S.-based Center for Near East Policy Research concluded that UNRWA "fosters terrorism, is antagonistic to the establishment of peace in the Middle East and works as a detriment to the well-being of the refugees themselves."

The 29-page report says it would be "entirely appropriate" for donor nations to withhold funding until UNRWA acknowledges the extent of the problem and fixes it.

In the House of Commons last week, Stockwell Day, the Conservative Party's foreign affairs critic, criticized the government for continuing to fund UNRWA, "despite the fact that there is clear evidence that [it] has on its payroll agents of the terrorist group Hamas."

Day asked why the Liberal government is "taking such a casual attitude toward the security of Palestinians while it has terrorists in its midst?"

Dan McTeague, parliamentary secretary to foreign affairs minister Pierre Pettigrew, said Ottawa "will take a position that is important for the security of all, particularly given the situation that exists today in the Middle East, and that provides us an opportunity to strive toward a better peaceful outcome."

McTeague said the government "will continue to work very hard to ensure that there is a peaceful resolution in the Middle East, and one that ensures a just and peaceful solution for all."

Day replied that "the very least we could be doing is ensure that Canadian taxpayer dollars are going to Palestinians in need, not to terrorists who are determined to wreck the process."

Post-Arafat era seen as uncertain

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel is teetering between hope and fear in the wake of Yasser Arafat's recent death, according to an Israeli journalist.

With his passing, Israelis are equally hopeful and fearful about the future, Lili Galili, a senior staff writer with the left-of-centre Israeli daily Ha'aretz, said last week.

But what comes after the Arafat era no one knows, Galili observed in a talk at the Barbara Frum Library sponsored by the New Israel Fund of Canada.

All that is certain is that Israelis and Palestinians alike yearn to live normal lives, she said.

Galili, who covers social and political issues and has written for Ha'aretz since 1980, said Israelis and Palestinians are locked in a totally symbiotic relationship."Whatever is good for us is good for them."

Arafat was a flawed politician, but he was demonized by Israel for its own ends, she said.

With Arafat gone and a new Palestinian leadership emerging, there is now a chance that Israel and the Palestinian Authority can work in tandem to implement Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan for a withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and four isolated settlements in the West Bank, Galili said.

"I don't advocate a unilateral disengagement."

She said she feels sorry for settlers who will be affected by the planned pullout, because they are victims of Israeli governments that encouraged them to settle in the areas to be vacated.

Israel can't afford to hold a referendum on the withdrawal, as some right-wing politicians demand, because Israeli democracy is too fragile, Galili noted.

In her view, poverty remains a pressing problem in Israel. Of late, 1,500 families have been thrown out of their homes after failing to meet their mortgage payments. And an additional 11,000 families face a similar situation.

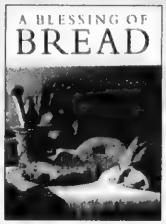
Chanukah Food Ideas

Cookbooks for everyone – from kids to professionals

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

Chanukah is around the corner and the spectre of buying gifts for family and friends looms large. What to buy? Where to buy?

Well, if anybody on your list is a "foodie" (a library of oil-and-butter-spattered cookbooks and a yen to try anything new in the culinary world is a dead giveaway), likes to cook or enjoys snuggling up with a hefty recipe-driven tome, then your gift-buying dilemma is over. A new cookbook is the ideal choice. Unlike a set of ultra-expensive pots and pans or copper-lined serving dishes, the gift of a cookbook won't break the bank (and you may just get the chance to reap the edible rewards yourself).



Cookbooks have never been so popular and this year, as in previous years, there is a dizzying array, offering something for everybody, from the novice baker to the experienced home cook, the cookbook groupie and the reference-buying professional (ahem, that would be me). To help sort out this delicious bounty, I've rounded up some of the most stellar publications to make some gift-giving recommendations.

Although not strictly a Jewish cookbook, Elegant Dairy Free Entertaining by Patricia Morales Fine, MD (Fontana Lithograph) is a great book to have on hand. Prompted to change her eating habits because of milk allergies, she wrote a cookbook that is perfect for kosher homes on the perennial lookout for pareve desserts. While there are smaller sections on appetizers, soups, salads and entrees, almost the entire second half of the book is devoted to decadent desserts with appetite-growling names such as Chocolate Cognac Espresso-cake, Pumpkin Cheesecake with Pecan Gingersnap Crust and Raspberry Chocolate Teasecake.

Another great baking book, a shoo-in for the bread bakers among us, is Maggie Glezer's A Blessing of Bread: Jewish Bread Baking Around the World (Artisan, a division of Workman Publishing, Inc.). This is a wonderfully researched book, with reams of historical data and a collection of folk tales, as well as a superb cross section of Ashkenazi and Sephardi specialties. With more than a baker's dozen recipes for challah alone, Glezer provides helpful diagrams for braiding two-, three-, four- or five-strand challahs. Each recipe is written with meticulous detail and coded for neophyte or expert bakers. And while many of the recipes should only be attempted by the experienced baker, it's worth reading the detailed primer at the beginning to gain an in-depth understanding of flours, yeast and why bread performs the way it does.

There are also a number of new must-haves without which no foodie's cookbook shelf would be complete. And topping that list are a number of Canadian cookbooks. First is the award-winning Bonnie Stern's Essentials of Home Cooking (Random House Canada). Though not a 2004 publication, this sumptuously photographed book ensures that Stern will continue to be one of the icons on the Canadian culinary landscape. She has an unbridled love of and passion for good food, as well as a deep appreciation of what people like to eat. The book is replete with personal anecdotes and helpful tips in Stern's distinctively friendly voice, and recipes that will undoubtedly become personal favourites. Her mouth-watering Braised Lamb Shanks recipe is worth the price of the book alone.

A Matter of Taste: Inspired Seasonal Menus With Wines and Spirits To Match by Lucy Waverman and James Chatto (Harper Collins) is another winner and must-have. These two authors are virtually synonymous with great food and the ability to write enchantingly about it. If you've ever had the privilege of reading Chatto, you're already familiar with his captivating prose. And of course, Waverman has been deliciously choreographing plates for more than three decades. This cookbook, seasonally organized with wonderfully flavourful dishes, comes with much careful wine-matching expertise and information on the history, making and enjoyment of wine and spirits.

The amazing culinary duo Naomi Duguid and Jeffrey Alford already had two other award-winning books to their credit (Flatbread and Flavours and Hot Sour Salty Sweet) before winning a third cookbook prize in September for Home Baking: The Artful Mix of Flour and Tradition Around the World (Random House Canada). An incredible weighty tome of both rudimentary and sophisticated dishes from around the world, this book delivers as much information about the global tradition of baking as it does versatile recipes. Reading this book is like a slow luxurious cruise around the kitchens of the world, and a tour of the ovens of French, Italian, German, British and South American families. If you wake up in the morning just dying to bake, then this is the book for you.

Be sure to check out the award-winning Hungry For Comfort: The Pleasures of Home Cooking (Penguin Books) by one of the grandes dames of Canadian cuisine, Rose Murray, and Weekday Wonders: Healthy Light Meals For Every Day (Penguin Canada) by Rose Reisman, who has given new meaning to the term everyday gourmet.

If you have kids and love to cook with them or want to bake with them, then look no further than Jennifer Low's new cookbook Kitchen For Kids (Whitecap) Written for kids and not for parents cooking for their kids, the 100 recipes in this one-of-a-kind book do not require a knife, stovetop cooking or the use of a small appliance. Low, who is the food editor of Canadian House and Home, has a clear, concise recipe-writing style that is easy for children and adults alike to understand and follow. Each recipe is accompanied by a stunning photograph, making it especially easy for kids to envision what they set out to make. My six-year-old son, Jacob, is captivated by this book. So successful was he in baking the cupcakes and Banana Fudge Bread, that he has taken the book to bed with him to mull over what else he can make.

And lest we forget that not all cookbooks are written by Canadians, Gourmet magazine has entered the cookbook scene with a hefty offering, The Gourmet Cookbook edited by Ruth Reichl (Houghton Mifflin). I have to admit that I love this 1040-page book and will be placing it alongside my Joy of Cooking and The Fannie Farmer Cookbook.

Filled with Reichl's engaging prose, The Gourmet Cookbook offers recipes for the classics as well as a splendid array of more innovative dishes. The recipes are precise, and because they are culled from Gourmet, they are guaranteed to work. Although there are no photographs in the book, many of its pages are devoted to comprehensive reference material. Reichl is quoted at the back of the book, saying, "Our goal was to give you a book with every recipe you would ever want." With more than 1,000 recipes, all indications are that they succeeded.

Other titles worth checking out are Marcella Hazan's new offering Marcella Says: Italian Cooking Wisdom From the Legendary Teacher's Master Classes (Harper Collins) and Jacques Pepin: Fast Food My Way (Houghton Mifflin). Hazan's book is a sheer delight to read. She explains why buying the best local ingredients in season is not enough. Instead, she persuades the reader that they have to understand how to coax flavour out of each ingredient by following several basic cooking techniques.

Fast food in Pepin's terms is about as far away as one can get from a North American understanding of that term. Treasures such as Chicken Breasts with Balsamic and Shallot Sauce, Smoked Salmon Timbales and Chocolate Hazelnut Brownie Cake hastily dispel any notions of ready-in-less-than-five minutes burgers and quickly convert the reader to the master chef's way of thinking. I decided to challenge some of his time frames – which accompany each recipe – and happily found that each delicious and satisfying recipe could be done in the allotted time.

The luscious and exquisitely appointed Barefoot in Paris: French Food You CAN Make at Home by Ina Garten (Potter) is the latest in the Barefoot Contessa series (there are three previous books). This book is filled with recipes for classic French fare such as cheese straws, pissaladiere, goat cheese tart and boeuf bourgignon, and for all of the classic French desserts. Beautifully laid out, Barefoot in Paris includes well-written recipes as well as elegant sections on how to dress up a table, how to choose French cheeses and a tremendously helpful shopping guide for your next trip to Paris. It's no wonder this book is virtually flying off shelves at cookbook stores.

The Great Book of Chocolate by former Chez Panisse pastry chef David Liebovitz (Ten Speed Press) is a chocoholic's dream. The first two-thirds of the book is devoted to a history of chocolate, an explanation of how chocolate is harvested and processed, a primer on how to taste and buy chocolate and one of the most comprehensive resource listings of websites for buying chocolate. Even as Leibovitz himself eats a morsel of chocolate each day, once you've made any of his recipes, you'll become a daily nibbler yourself.

Dairy free and delicious

This year for your Chanukah celebration, why not prepare this delicious recipe for Tomatoes Greco

By NORENE GILLETZ

The chanukiyah is lit each of the eight nights of Chanukah, in honour of the miracle of a tiny jar of oil, sufficient to light the menorah for one day, burning for a full eight days. It is traditional to eat foods prepared with oil, such as potato latkes and sufganiyot (Israeli-style donuts filled with jelly).

Dairy dishes such as cheese latkes are also customary. The Jewish heroine Judith helped secure a victory for the Jewish forces by slaying Holofernes, the vicious general of the Greek army. She gave him salty cheese to eat, followed by strong wine to quench his thirst. The wine caused him to fall into a deep sleep. Judith seized the sword of Holofernes and slew him with it. His soldiers fled, resulting in the victory of the Macabees.

This year for your Chanukah celebration, why not prepare this delicious recipe for Tomatoes Greco. These stuffed tomatoes make a wonderful addition to a brunch menu or are ideal as a side dish for a dairy meal. You'll love the tangy combination of feta cheese, red onions, oregano and long grain white rice baked inside plump red tomatoes, adding a Mediterranean accompaniment to any fish dish.

After tasting this tasty vegetable dish, I'm sure you will agree that "variety is the rice of life!" This recipe is courtesy of USA Rice Federation. Visit their website at www.riceinfo.com. Enjoy.

TOMATOES GRECO

8 large tomatoes
3 cups cooked rice, hot
½ cup chopped red onion
¾ cup crumbled feta cheese
1½ tsp. dried oregano
1 tsp. salt
⅓ cup vegetable oil
garnish: chopped fresh parsley

Remove tops of tomatoes and scoop out insides; drain upside-down on paper towels.

In a large bowl, combine rice, onion, cheese, oregano and salt. Spoon rice mixture into tomatoes, drizzle with oil and place in a 9 x 13-inch (3-litre) baking dish. Bake in the oven at 425 until hot, about 20 minutes. Sprinkle with parsley and serve. Makes 8 servings.

For the dairy-sensitive individual, the list of foods to avoid seems endless. No cheeses, no creamy soups or sauces, no milk chocolate, cheesecake, ice cream, butter, cheese, lasagna, no Caesar salad. Many pre-packaged foods contain dairy as well.

Dr. Patricia Morales Fine was shocked when she discovered that she was allergic to milk. Then she learned she also was lactose-intolerant. When she eliminated dairy foods from her diet, her symptoms disappeared. However, Fine missed eating creamy soups, buttery sauces and rich desserts.

She experimented tirelessly and eventually created Easy Elegant Dairy-Free Entertaining. In the comprehensive cookbook, Fine dispels the myth that rich and creamy recipes have to include dairy foods. She offers excellent alternatives to traditional dairy-laden recipes and includes many new recipes that will become family favourites. Although this is not a kosher cookbook, the kosher cook will find many helpful tips on how to cook pareve dairy-free recipes.

You'll find recipes for Shamelessly Stuffed French Toast, Killer Smoked Salmon Dip, Chocolate Bread Pudding Surprise and Regret-Me-Not Brownies. There are beautiful photos, plus many tips on how to cook dairy-free, including dairy-free substitutions. The inside cover includes helpful charts, including a Prohibited Ingredient Shopping List, Safety Rules for Dining Out, Safe Non-Dairy Substitutes and Watch Out for Hidden Dairy.

For Chanukah, be sure to try these light, airy pancakes with a hint of citrus. Perfect for breakfast or brunch, they are ideal for those on a dairy-free diet – or anyone else! Visit Fine's website at www.dairyfree gourmet.com for more helpful information, resources and ordering information.

FLUFFY FLAPJACKS

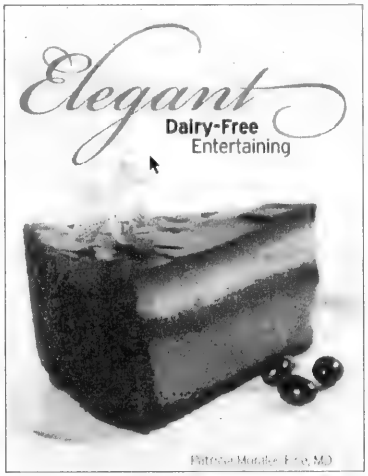
3 large egg whites
2 large egg yolks
1/2 cup Rice Dream (original)
1/2 tsp. pure lemon extract
1/2 tsp. orange oil or extract
1/2 cup all-purpose flour
1 tsp. granulated sugar
1/2 tsp. salt
1 tbsp. canola oil
1 medium banana, sliced (optional)
1 recipe Seasoned Maple Syrup (below)

In a large bowl, whip egg whites until soft peaks form, then set aside. In a separate large bowl, beat yolks with Rice Dream and extracts. Slowly stir in flour, sugar and salt; then fold in whipped whites in three additions.

Heat canola oil on large griddle over medium heat. Then ladle pancake batter onto hot griddle for desired pancake size (about 1/4 cup per pancake). Flip the pancakes once edges are brown. Add canola oil as needed to keep pancakes from sticking. Serve with warm Seasoned Maple Syrup. Makes 4 servings. Garnish with roasted nuts, fresh fruit and syrup.

Variations: Press a few thin banana slices into each pancake just after pouring batter onto griddle.

Tips: Stir batter just before pouring each batch. The very last batch may lose some air and result in thinner flapjacks.



SEASONED MAPLE SYRUP

1 cup pure maple syrup
2 cinnamon sticks
1/2 tsp. nutmeg, freshly grated
1/2 cup chopped walnuts
1 medium pear, peeled and coarsely chopped (core removed)
1/4 tsp. pure vanilla extract

In a medium saucepan, mix all ingredients together. Simmer over low-medium heat for 5 to 10 minutes, or until needed. Makes 4 servings.

Variations: Use chopped apples, bananas and/or raisins instead of (or in addition to) the pear.

Tips: Avoid overly ripe fruit because it may disintegrate or turn mushy when heated.

Chanukah Food Ideas

Finding the energy for Chanukah – and making applesauce

By LISA J. SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

By the time Chanukah rolls around, I have spent the last three to four weeks cleaning and cooking up a storm for a Thanksgiving feast; planning, decorating and baking for my daughter's birthday party; volunteering and baking some more for several school holiday celebrations; shopping, preparing and delivering gifts for family and friends; and, of course, working full-time to meet all of my writing deadlines. Usually, as I take the menorah out of the cabinet, I am fighting off a cold and longing for the celebrating to end, so I can sleep.

But as a single mom, I have no choice but to dig deep and find one more layer of energy, and holiday joy, to share with my daughter as she excitedly waits to open gifts, play dreidel, light candles and eat latkes.

I have this wonderful old book, A Treasury of Jewish Holidays: History, Legends, Traditions by Hyman E. Goldfin. My father must have bought it at one of his cherished used-book sale haunts, because on the title page, next to where my mom wrote her name, is the price, written in pencil, 35 cents.

Inside it starts with a 20-year calendar of Jewish festivals and fasts from 1951-52 to 1970-71. Each holiday section begins with a vintage pen and ink drawing – observant men in prayer; women preparing food; families at a festival meal; men and boys seated and dressed in slacks, shirts and ties; and smiling women and girls standing, wearing perfectly pressed dresses, and holding platters of food.

I don't use this book as a factual resource so much as for a cultural one, because even the choice of words as well as their meaning reflect the standards of another generation. Under the Chanukah chapter, I found sentences such as, "Returning from the synagogue after Ma'ariv service, the master of the house finds the Chanukah lamp all prepared for the occasion. A holiday spirit pervades the house and all is cheerful and gay." Or, "During Chanukah, after the evening meal, people usually indulge in playing such games as checkers, chess, dominoes, card and one special game known as kautowes… arithmetic riddles and puzzles."

I am intrigued by the quaint orderliness of the book's words and pictures. However, one Chanukah, with my throat burning and my body's centre of gravity pushing me down, I found particular relevance in the first sentence of the Chanukah chapter. It asks, "What is Chanukah?" and answers, "In Hebrew, Chanukah means dedication."

Although the term refers to the re-dedication of the Temple by the Jews after they defeated the Greeks, I think it is a perfectly modern description for many of us who celebrate the holiday today. Since Chanukah falls during such a busy time of year, celebrating requires a special dedication. Like the Maccabees, who were outnumbered, out-supplied, and certainly low on energy, we must also work with what we have left to keep this holiday alive.

On the day preceding the first night of Chanukah, I was too tired to make yet another trip to the grocery store for latke fixings, so we had warm bowls of soup, lit the Chanukah candles, and without much fanfare, my daughter opened her first present. But on the second day, I re-entered my kitchen and found one box of instant latke mix and a refrigerator drawer full of apples.

I set a dozen apples on the kitchen table so we could sit while my daughter peeled and I sliced and cored. We added into the mix a couple of ripe pears and some delicious dried Turkish apricots. Soon three pots holding three different version of applesauce simmered on the stove. My daughter loved the cinnamon smell, and I couldn't wait to feel the warm applesauce on my raw throat.

When we sat down to our first latke dinner, late on the second night, three colourful candles were lit on the menorah, the gifts were lined up on an old bookshelf and a bowl of shiny chocolate gelt was on the table, I was wearing wrinkled corduroy overalls and my daughter was in her sparkly embroidered blue jeans. We ate together, her thrilled with the latkes and excited for the coming game of dreidel, me soothed by the warm applesauce and our modern picture of Chanukah dedication.

CHUNKY APPLE-APPLE SAUCE

Since Granny Smith apples are firmer than other apples, they add the chunks to this mixed applesauce as well as a nice tart contrast to the sweeter sauce.

3 Granny Smith apples
2 Jonagold apples
¼ tsp. cinnamon
1 tsp. lemon juice, fresh

Peel, core and cut apples in ¾-inch chunks. In a medium saucepan over medium-high heat, bring apples, cinnamon, lemon juice and ¼ cup of water to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer, covered, mashing and stirring every few minutes. Uncover the last few minutes so excess water cooks off. Cook approximately 15 minutes or until some apples have softened into sauce and some are chunky. Serves 6.

Serving suggestions: Serve warm or chilled with latkes.

APPLE PEAR SAUCE

My daughter loves pears, so I thought this might be a good combination. It is sweeter, softer and darker in colour and extra soothing warmed.

2 Jonagold apples
1 Granny Smith apple
2 Bartlett pears, ripe
1 tsp. cinnamon
pinch ground clove
1/4 tsp. lemon juice, fresh

Peel, core and cut apples into chunks and pears into slices. In a medium saucepan over medium-high heat, bring apples, pears, cinnamon, clove, lemon juice and two tablespoons of water to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer covered, mashing and stirring every few minutes. Uncover the last few minutes so excess water cooks off. Cook approximately 15 minutes or until apples and pears are soft and saucy. Serves 6.

Serving suggestions: Serve warm or chilled with latkes.

APPLE APRICOT SAUCE

I was surprised by the beautiful colour of this sauce, golden yellow with bright orange chunks. And the taste is bright as well with the added texture of chewy, soft apricot.

2 Jonagold apples
1 Granny Smith apple
1/4 cup dried apricots, chopped small pinch nutmeg
1/4 tsp. lemon juice

Peel, core and cut apples into chunks. In a medium saucepan over medium-high heat, bring apples, apricots, nutmeg, lemon juice, and 1/4 cup of water to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer covered, mashing and stirring every few minutes. Uncover the last few minutes so excess water cooks off. Cook approximately 15 minutes or until apples and apricots are soft and saucy. Serves 4.

Serving suggestions: Serve warm or chilled with latkes.

Note: You can add sugar (one to three tbsp.) to any of these recipes to taste. I prefer applesauce without sugar, highlighting just the taste of the fruit.

Coast to Coast

Justice minister uses Jewish values to guide his work

The notion of Jewish values, human rights and public policy can be summed up in Hillel's statement that begins, "If I am not for myself, who will be for me?" said Cotler.

Referring to the second part of the statement, "If I am only for myself, what am I?" Cotler said, "If we do not get involved in the larger struggle for human rights and human dignity in our time, then we not only diminish those struggles; by our absence, we diminish ourselves as Jews."

And referring to the last part, "If not now, when?" he said involvement with human rights must have a sense of urgency.

Cotler cited a number of Jewish values that he said underpin an approach to basic human rights, including remembrance, guarding one's tongue, not being a bystander to evil, liberating captives, supporting women's rights and protecting the most vulnerable.

Earlier this year, the House of Commons unanimously condemned anti-Semitism for the first time, he noted. After a rash of anti-Semitic hate crimes in March, Cotler condemned them as "an assault on the inherent dignity and worth of every human being," and called on fellow parliamentarians to join him in condemning anti-Semitism. They did so in a unanimous vote. "If one person of any party had objected, [the motion] would not have passed."

Cotler lauds new Jewish learning event

When a mosque was torched in Pickering, Cotler noted that he met with Jewish, Muslim and other faith leaders at Temple Har Zion, which shares a driveway with the adjacent Ja'ffari Islamic Centre.

"I said, 'We have to create a culture where Jews speak out on behalf of Muslims when Muslims are attacked, and where Muslims speak out on behalf of Jews when Jews are attacked, and that they both speak out when any vulnerable groups are attacked. [We have to] send the message that this must be a country where there will be no refuge for hate or bigotry. That's what it means to create a country with a true multi-cultural mosaic.'

"That has to be our objective as... Jews who take Jewish values and human rights seriously in this country in our shared citizenship with other Canadians."

Cotler stressed that the notion of pursuing justice is as applicable to individuals as it is to a community. "Each of us can be a kind of private attorney general or minister of justice. Everyone here has the capacity, every day, to do something, somewhere, on behalf of some victim of discrimination and disadvantage. It doesn't have to be the big macro thing. It just means a touch of human kindness every day in a word that's spoken or in a word that's not spoken."

Visiting the sick and refraining from "lashon hara [slander] when we may not know about the kind of ill will that will befall the people about whom we are [talking]" were two examples he cited.

"These Jewish values can help us every day to make a difference. We need not just dream of building a just society. We can, in our human relations and our everyday lives, help create it," he said to a standing ovation.

A second-time Limmud speaker who was on the program in England two years ago, Cotler said he hoped the Canadian spinoff would resonate in Toronto and beyond. If it can be replicated in every community in the country, he said, "the notion of talmud Torah k'neged kulam [learning above all] will begin to permeate our community, and that's the kind of inspiration this community needs."

The first-time event was sold out, with more than 400 people. Topics ranged from "Jewish Cooking" to "Comic Book Golems," from "Table Manners and Morality in Rabbinic Literature" to "Anti-Semitism," "Coverage of Israel in the Press" and "Hillel and Shammai." An Israel program for children, and a chevrutah study session on the theme of "The Body" were also included in the day's offerings.

Chair Peter Sevitt, the driving force behind bringing Limmud here, expressed the hope that it would become a weekend event and a residential event, as it is in the United Kingdom.

Group says Hamas fundraising in Canada

Naresh Raghubeer, CCD's executive director, said only "gross incompetence" could explain how federal authorities permitted the Jerusalem Fund to re-emerge and do business in Canada under the IRFAN brand. He said IRFAN-Canada uses the same address and fax number as the Jerusalem Fund.

A search of the Internet by The CJN quickly uncovered the link. A website catering to Muslim students and another geared to Muslim entrepreneurs provided contact information for the Jerusalem Fund. The fund's mailing address in Mississauga and its fax number were identical to the ones advertised on IRFAN's website.

Stockwell Day

Other IRFAN offices are located in Ottawa and Montreal. IRFAN claims to support charitable work and its Ramadan pledge card says funds it raised would help the hungry, injured, homeless, destitute, poor and needy.

The Jerusalem Fund also operated as a charitable organization. However, National Post reporter Stewart Bell noted in an article earlier this year that the Jerusalem Fund was one of four front groups named in a secret Privy Council Office memo that was sent to then prime minister Jean Chrétien on May 23, 2000. The memo discussed groups that were linked with terrorism.

Raghubeer said CCD relied on research conducted in Israel by the Centre for the Study of Intelligence and Terror (CSIT) to draw the links between IRFAN and Hamas.

A summary of a CSIT document circulated by CCD stated, "IRFAN (formerly the Jerusalem Fund) is the goal-oriented fund of the Hamas movement in Canada that raises and send funds to support the social infrastructure of the movement in the 'territories.' This infrastructure, which is funded by money from Canada and other places in the world, assists Hamas to build itself as a replacement for the Palestinian Authority and to bring into existence a structure that supports terror.

"Although during this period of an international fight against the financing of terror and despite the fact that the Canadian authorities identified the Jerusalem Fund as supporting Hamas, the Jerusalem Fund continues its activities under the new form of IRFAN."

The report notes that the Jerusalem Fund was created sometime around 1991 and "transferred to Hamas institutions in the territories yearly aid estimated at many hundreds of thousands of dollars."

The leaders of the Jerusalem Fund decided around late 2001 - early 2002 to change the name of the organization to IRFAN. The report suggests these unnamed "people of the Jerusalem Fund felt that the noose was tightening around them" due to the increased anti-terrorism focus of the Canadian government. The change "was meant to mask its connection with Hamas and to impede Canadian law enforcement to bring charges against them."

The report also claims IRFAN's main office is in east Jerusalem and it is headed by a known Hamas operative.

Israeli researcher and journalist David Bedein, who was scheduled to join CCD at its news conference this week, along with Conservative Party foreign affairs critic Stockwell Day, said CSIT is a highly regarded Israeli intelligence think-tank.

He said his own research highlighted links between the Jerusalem Fund and the International Solidarity Movement, a Palestinian-led organization of foreign volunteers who act as "spotters," reconnaissance agents and couriers for Palestinian terrorists.

In addition, he has researched the connection between the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA), which receives Canadian government funding, and Hamas. The terrorist group has taken over labour unions, teachers' associations and other elements of civil society that operate in UNRWA camps, and even uses the camps as bases from which to attack Israel, Bedein said.

Canadians are supporting Hamas both through government allocations and through voluntary donations which are tax-receipted, he added.

Lawyer's Cotler-CJC plot allegation dismissed

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Quebec City lawyer Guy Bertrand has charged that Justice Minister Irwin Cotler plotted with Canadian Jewish Congress to have Rosalie Abella appointed to the Supreme Court in order to influence the case against his client – a Rwandan alleged to have committed hate crimes – who is facing deportation.

Bertrand has asked the Supreme Court to reject the appeal by the federal government of the Federal Court of Appeal's decision in 2003 to let Léon Mugesera and his family stay in Canada because, he says, it cannot be impartial in the case. The appeal is set to be heard Dec. 8.

Bertrand argues that Cotler did not disclose to the parliamentary committee that reviewed Abella's proposed appointment his close ties with her and her husband Irving Abella, a former CJC president, and with CJC, of which Cotler is also a past president, and he should have withdrawn from the process.

He is trying to prove that Cotler and the Abellas have a common interest in seeing that Mugesera is deported. CJC has intervener status in the case, as does B'nai Brith Canada and Human Rights Watch, which Bertrand alleges Cotler also has connections with.

Both Cotler and Rosalie Abella have in the past, before holding their current posts, participated in public events where Mugesera's alleged crimes were denounced.

Mugesera, a Hutu political activist who has been living in Quebec for 10 years, is alleged to have incited genocide and racial hatred in Rwanda against the Tutsi minority in a 1992 speech. The Federal Court dismissed those allegations.

"The failure to withdraw from the nomination process and to reveal all the truth can only lead a well-informed observer to conclude that unfortunately when you are powerful, rich and influential like the [Canadian Jewish] Congress, for example, you can infiltrate the court through political and judicial lobbying," Bertrand stated in a brief to the Supreme Court.

The portrayal of CJC as powerful and of conspiring with Cotler is repeated in Mugesera's own affidavit to the Supreme Court: "I live in anguish, not knowing everything that awaits me and my family as a result of pressures by interveners such as the powerful Canadian Jewish Congress in collaboration with the Justice Minister and Attorney General."

CJC president Ed Morgan said: "I'm surprised that someone would make this kind of conspiracy allegation. It seems so far-fetched, and it is hard for me to believe that anyone would find this argument credible, this kind of untoward link between the Minister of Justice, a current judge of the Supreme Court and one of Canada's leading historians and legal scholars."

The Justice Department rejected Bertrand's conspiracy theory as unreasonable and without substantiation.

In its brief, it dismissed his allegations as "frivolous," and "absurd, even shocking." It has asked the Supreme Court to reject his motion and proceed with the case against Mugesera.

The department brief does not comment on the facts as presented by Bertrand, but it does note that Cotler was not justice minister when the appeal was launched. Abella has also withdrawn for the Mugesera case. Bertrand must make a final response by this week to the Justice Department's brief. The Supreme Court is to decide by early next month whether to hear Bertrand's challenge or reject it and go ahead with the appeal.

Cotler is refusing to comment publicly on the case.

גידי קורן וחברים

ישראל, נובמבר 2004

אברהם קן האלם

בתור אחד שמדלג כרגיל מארץ לארץ, מנמל תעופה לנמל תעופה, מאניברסיטה לבית חולים, שפיתה דרגה מסויימת של ציניות למה שהוא רואה ולמה שאומרים לו- יש לי מבחן קטן שאני עובר שלוש פעמים בשנה. אחרי שתים- עשרה שעות טיסה, שינה טרופה ופה חמוץ- מגיעה אותה שְׁנִיָּה קטנה שבה מתגלים אורות תל אביב. ואז בלי לחשוב הרבה אני נותן לעצמי דין וחשבון קטן על מה אני מרגיש. אפשר לכתוב על זה ספר שלם, אבל ממש ממש בקיצור- נכנסת לחזה מן תחושה כזאת מְרַגֶּשֶׁת, שִׂמְחָה (על שאני כאן), וְעָצֶב (על שאני כאן כל כך מעט), ולפעמים גם דמעה. בשתי מלים-להגיע חביתה. אין שום מקום בעולם שעושה לי את זה. חופים הם לפעמים נעגועים לבית.

אבל במשך כל אותן שנים הם שמעו ברמלה, בנתיבות ובשכונת התקווה יום ולילה גם את "יצאנו אט", "מה אברך" ואת "הַרְעוּת", וגם השירים האלה הפכו לחלק מן החיים שלהם. באלבום החדש הם מציגים את הפירוש שלהם ל"שירי ישראל היפה". לשמוע את זוהבה בן שרה את "מה אברך"-זוהי חוויה מצמררת, כמו גם את שלומי שבת ב- "אתם זוכרים את השירים". האלבום המשולש נותן הרבה כבוד לשירי ארץ ישראל "היפה", והם אומרים: אלה הם גם השירים שלנו. אם לא שמתם לב-גם אנחנו היינו כאן בחמשים השנים האחרונות, והשירים נגעו גם בנו". שווה להקשיב ולהתרגש.

'Window of opportunity' seen existing for peace

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Yasser Arafat's death has paved the way for Israel's resumption of bilateral peace talks with the Palestinians, the former deputy Speaker of the Knesset says.

"This window of opportunity will be very short and very brief," Naomi Chazan warned last week at the University of Toronto.

In a speech sponsored by Canadian Friends of Peace Now and Hillel Greater Toronto, she urged Israel to seize the day.

"If we don't know how to take advantage of this situation of change, we will probably lose the chance for a viable two-state solution."

Chazan, a Meretz party Knesset member from 1992 to 2003, declared that Palestinian sovereignty is definitely in Israel's interests.

As she put it, "A Palestinian state coexisting with Israel is imperative for Israel's survival as a Jewish state with a Jewish majority."

"The Zionist challenge" today calls on Israel to acquiesce to the creation of a viable Palestinian state within the framework of a permanent peace accord.

In this connection, Chazan said that Israel and the Palestinians should embark on the path of resolving complex final status issues from permanent borders to Palestinian refugees.

"We don't have time for an interim settlement," she said, referring to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan for a unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip. "We need to negotiate an end game."

With Arafat's passing, she added, Sharon can no longer use the excuse that Israel has no negotiating partner on the Palestinian side.

Chazan – a Hebrew University professor of political science and currently the Wilhelm Fellow at the Center for International Studies at MIT – expressed mixed feelings about Sharon's yet-to-be implemented disengagement scheme.

It is a coercive arrangement without Palestinian input, an exercise in conflict management rather than conflict resolution and annexationist in spirit because it is underpinned by Sharon's desire to annex parts of the West Bank.

But Israel's peace camp basically supports Sharon's plan because it represents a step away from occupation and sets an important precedent in the dismantlement of settlements in the territories, she explained.

Arafat's demise will set off a succession struggle, and perhaps cause further chaos and anarchy, in the Palestinian areas.

But his death will encourage Palestinian moderates to speak their minds and enable Palestinians to rebuild institutions wrecked by Israel since the outbreak of the second intifadah.

Chazan accused the newly re-elected Bush administration of being inconsistent in the pursuit of peace.

President George W. Bush espouses a two state solution within the context of a comprehensive agreement. But by the same token, he backs the Gaza disengagement plan, which diverges from the multilateral character of the "road map to peace."

"The Bush administration can't afford such inconsistencies."

In addition, she claimed in a jab at Washington's lack of even-handedness, the United States must restore its status as an honest broker between Israel and the Palestinians.

As payback for his support of the United States' invasion of Iraq last year, Bush's ally, Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain, is pushing for an end to the Arab-Israeli conflict, Chazan said.

Looking ahead, she outlined three possible scenarios that could unfold.

- Israel's struggle with the Palestinians will escalate if the status quo prevails.
- Current tensions will be perpetuated if Sharon does not broaden his Gaza plan to include more than the evacuation of four settlements in the West Bank.
- Israel and the new Palestinian leadership will resume talks. Negotiations should be based on the formula of a two state solution as proposed by the 2003 Geneva Accord, Chazan suggested.

She made two last observations.

Marwan Barghouti, the Palestinian leader imprisoned by Israel, may yet run as a candidate for the presidency of the Palestinian Authority.

If Sharon calls an election on the issue of a withdrawal from Gaza, he would win a "whopping victory."

In a rare tribute to Sharon, a political opponent, Chazan remarked, "He's an extraordinarily skillful politician."

Family says Elizabeth Taylor has Nazi-looted art

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — A Canadian lawyer who claims a Vincent van Gogh painting now in actress Elizabeth Taylor's possession was among property his great-grandmother lost when she fled Nazi Germany says Taylor is holding his family's lawsuit up to standards of evidence that most Holocaust-era confiscation claims could not meet.

Andrew Orkin of Hamilton and F. Mark Orkin, Sarah-Rose Josepha Adler and A. Heinrich Zille, all of South Africa, are suing Taylor over ownership of the painting. They believe the late Margarete Mauthner was forced to give it up due to "Nazi economic and political coercion" before she left Berlin for South Africa in 1939.

"Families did not arrive in Johannesburg with receipts and filing cabinets. They arrived with small suitcases. And those were the lucky ones," Andrew Orkin said.

Mauthner's heirs allege that Taylor failed to review the ownership history of View of the Asylum and Chapel at Saint-Remy before acquiring it more than 40 years ago.

They are seeking restitution and the painting, which has been appraised at between $10 million and $15 million (US). Taylor's father bought the painting on her behalf from Sotheby's of London for $260,000 in 1963.

"Ms. Taylor's position seems to be that unless your family's paintings ended up on Hermann Goering's living room wall, you're not a worthy claimant. But it's well known that few expropriated or coerced Jewish assets ended up in actual Nazi hands," Orkin said.

"The genocide was preceded by what [now Attorney General] Irwin Cotler [has called] 'thefticide,' namely the massive state-engineered dispossession of all Jews between 1933 and the early 1940s."

Actress' father bought van Gogh at auction in '63

To be a worthy claimant does not mean "your painting had to be taken off your wall by Nazis in jackboots," Orkin said, adding that "Ms. Taylor's positions fly in the face of all reputable scholarship, and even U.S. and Allied policy and law, since 1945."

None of the allegations in the lawsuit, filed last month in California, have been proven in court.

In an e-mail interview, Taylor's lawyer Jonathan Bloom said the case is about "the truth about what happened to this painting."

Earlier this year, Taylor filed a claim asking to be declared the rightful owner of the painting.

Her declaration of ownership states that the descendants' claim is "a factually baseless attempt to bluff" her out of a treasured possession.

She claims Mauthner gave up possession of the painting some time after 1928 and before 1933, when the Nazis came to power. After coming into the possession of two art dealers, she said, it was sold to Alfred Wolf, a Munich art dealer who himself fled Germany around 1933.

Taylor claims Wolf's heirs sold the painting in 1963.

"The heirs of those who were truly dispossessed of art and other valuable property by the Nazis are, of course, extremely sympathetic claimants. But when as here, such claimants are unable to document their purported rights – and, indeed, the available evidence indicates that they have no such rights… the law owes them no special deference," Taylor states in her claim.

Mauthner died in 1947 at age 84. As a young woman in Berlin, she was part of an association of progressive artists, and was instrumental in introducing van Gogh to Germany. She also translated his letters into German in 1907.

The family claims that two catalogues raisonné, one written in 1928 and another in 1939, named Mauthner as the owner of the painting. A catalogue raisonné is a complete documentation, compiled by a recognized scholar, of an artist's production. The documents are widely accepted in art circles as the definitive history of a piece of art.

There had been silences in Orkin's family regarding the Holocaust era, but in the 1990s, it became a subject of discussion, he said.

"It had been family lore that Margarete Mauthner had some paintings and it might be worth looking into it," Orkin said. "On the basis of historical evidence, we believe we have a bona fide basis for a claim."

The lawsuit by Orkin, his two siblings and an uncle asserts that the U.S. Holocaust Victims Redress Act of 1998 regards artworks sold or forfeited as a result of the policies of Nazi Germany as having been wrongfully confiscated by Nazi authorities and requires that such works be returned to their original owners or heirs.

The lawsuit contends that to recover artwork under the act, a claimant does not need to establish that the artwork was "stolen" in the usual sense of the term. Rather, the lawsuit maintains, a claimant need only show that the artwork was lost as a direct consequence of Nazi persecution.

Reported cases in many countries include Jewish citizens who were forced to sell artwork for food, to obtain passports or because of policies directing Jews to deposit artworks at municipal pawnshops.

The U.S. House of Representatives passed the Holocaust Victims Redress Act in 1998 to assist in the restitution of assets looted or extorted from Holocaust victims.

Orkin said the family has not discussed what it will do with the painting if the suit is successful.

"This is not about money," he said. "It has to do with Holocaust redress and the simple principle of doing the right thing."

Commentator acknowledges post-Arafat era difficulties

Positive environment on the ground needed

Almost as soon as Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's death was announced, attention turned to Israel.

Some media analysts said Arafat was the excuse Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon used to avoid dealing with the Palestinians, so with Arafat gone, he must make peace with a new Palestinian leadership.

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

For others, the picture was far more complex, although still laden with expectations for Sharon.

In "The world without Arafat," (Globe and Mail, Nov. 11), Michael Bell, a former Canadian ambassador to Israel and the Palestinian Authority, wrote: "If Mr. Sharon does not respond with imagination now, a real chance for progress will be lost."

Bell outlined the measures Sharon could undertake to help bolster Palestinian moderates. He also wrote: "Of course, the new Palestinian leadership must do everything it can to stop the terrorists. Without this there will be no enabling climate."

Indeed, the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan stipulated that, as a necessary first stage, the Palestinians must stop violence and terrorism. (As the lead editorial in the Nov. 13 Economist put it: "What the road map demands is not just a truce but the disarming of the radical factions… and therefore an end to the intifada.") Bell's opinion piece at least discussed how difficult it may be to accomplish this.

Arafat's successors inherit "anarchic conditions," Bell wrote. Arafat "made a practice of sabotaging his advisers when they seemed to grow too powerful and rehabilitated them only once he had cut them down to size. He hobbled the institutions of state so they could play no effective role." The result is that the the West Bank and Gaza are "dominated by warlords and religious radicals."

Palestinian pragmatists such as PA Prime Minister Ahmed Queria and PLO Chairman Mahmoud Abbas have almost no support among their people – opinion polls show that they have a combined popular support of about five per cent.

The " radical" offshoots of Fatah, such as Tanzim and the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, pose a challenge to any leadership willing to reach an accommodation with Israel. And Islamic extremist groups, including Hamas and Islamic Jihad, remain violently opposed to any agreement.

Bell acknowledged these negative factors, yet still called on the "Palestinians, Israelis, Americans and, indeed, the entire international community, including Canada" to establish the "positive environment on the ground for future comprehensive negotiations."

With all the negative forces at play, it's hard to believe that outside intervention will effect the changes necessary within the Palestinian community itself. Since Bell's column was published, armed Palestinian militants fired on Abbas, while Hamas and Islamic Jihad announced that they refused to stop attacking Israelis.

Such developments make it almost impossible for Israeli forces to ease their hold on the territories. Some may blame Israel for failing to loosen security restrictions so that Palestinians can move about more freely in advance of elections. But Israel has a primary obligation to protect the lives of its citizens, who remain under constant threat of attack. And Israel can do little to help solidify the base of Abbas and Qureia – in fact, support from Israel and the United States may only further erode their already meagre support among Palestinians.

The type of Palestinian leadership that emerges after Arafat is the key to U.S. re-engagement, according to Peter Beinart, editor of the New Republic.

In an interview with TVO's Studio 2 host Steve Paikin (Nov. 15), Beinart said: "I think that America is going to try to help hold elections in January. And if those elections produce a Palestinian leadership that is moderate, that is honest, and can bring some kind of unity to the Palestinian Authority, and then sit down with Israel, I think the Bush administration might get quite re-engaged. But the first step will have to be from the Palestinians looking forward to these elections."

Beinart clearly stated the necessary sequence of events in order to restart the peace process. This is something all Middle East analysts should bear in mind.

They wrote and circulated leaflets across Germany in protest against Hitler's regime, were found out, jailed and executed by the Nazis. Brother and sister Hans and Sophie Scholl were arrested on February 18, 1943 sentenced to death on February 22, 1943 and executed that same day. Dershowitz defends Israel at Ottawa JNF dinner

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Dismayed by what he feels is the almost total silence on U.S. college campuses when it comes to defending Israel, Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz has vowed to do something about it.

"I decided to waive all royalties on my book and we are distributing thousands of copies of my book to every college student who wants them, to give them information so that they can speak out," Dershowitz, author of A Case for Israel, told Ottawa's annual Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Dinner, held Nov. 15 at the Westin Hotel.

Students are not speaking out partly out of ignorance, but also out of fear, and faculty members are also staying silent, he said.

"Fifty per cent of American universities do not have a single, solitary professor, assistant professor or administrator prepared to speak on behalf of Israel. You hear silence," Dershowitz, the evening's keynote speaker, said.

It's not just because of the large and growing anti-Israel lobby, he added. "I have more antagonism for pro-Israel professors who support Israel but won't speak out. Some of them have tenure and are still afraid to speak out."

Dershowitz, a civil rights advocate who is known for defending such high-profile clients as as O.J. Simpson and financier Michael Milken, said he is not in a position to comment on what's happening at Canadian universities.

"It would be presumptuous, even by a person who wrote a booked called Chutzpah, to tell you how to conduct yourselves here in Canada," he said.

Students staying silent out of fear, says professor

(Dershowitz has, however, stated that he refuses to speak at Montreal's Concordia University – and has urged other academics to boycott it as well – until former Israeli prime ministers Ehud Barak and Benjamin Netanyahu can speak there. Barak has not been allowed to speak at Concordia due to security concerns stemming from a 2002 campus speech by Netanyahu that sparked a violent demonstration.)

Dershowitz spoke highly of the work done by JNF and his pride in helping its cause.

"JNF is a phenomenal organization, really the backbone of Israel," he said. "We grew up with the blue and white box. I have a collection of old JNF boxes from even before the State of Israel."

Proceeds from this year's dinner will go to establish the Ottawa Recreation and Picnic Area in the Lahav Forest near Be'er Sheva.

The sold-out crowd of more than 550 people included local politicians and dignitaries such as Ottawa Mayor Bob Chiarelli – the dinner's honorary chair and the 1999 Negev Dinner honoree – and Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker.

Prior to the dinner, Chiarelli received letters from Palestinian supporters in Ottawa urging him not to attend.

The Ottawa Sun, quoting from letters Chiarelli received, reported that they objected to Dershowitz's defence of Israeli practices against Palestinian terrorism, They also said JNF is "associated with B'nai Brith and Canadian Jewish Congress," which "advocate for Israel, not for peace and justice" and "are an affront to Canadian values and to Arab and Muslim Canadians."

The Canada-Israel Committee, in response, asked local Jews to write Chiarelli and urge him to attend the dinner. It also noted that the event would benefit an area in the Negev, which is undisputed territory.

At the dinner, Chiarelli emphasized Ottawa's pride in its interfaith relations, adding that he had spoken a few days earlier at a Muslim celebration and was also appearing at the Negev dinner.

"Ottawa is indeed an oasis in a world of change and conflict," he said.

Jewish groups upset university won't discipline Elmasry

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

"Not good enough" is the way Jewish organizations and a campus student group are describing the decision by the University of Waterloo (UW) to accept the apology of Prof. Mohamed Elmasry and forgo disciplinary action.

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada said last week the university should have imposed some sort of sanction against Elmasry for his televised statement that all Israelis over 18, including civilians, are legitimate targets for Palestinian violence.

Leo Adler, Canadian spokesperson for the Simon Wiesenthal Center, said the university should sponsor a public forum in which Elmasry apologizes directly to the university community and acknowledges specifically why his comments were wrong.

And Tomer Chervinsky, president of the Waterloo-Israel Public Affairs Club, said, "I'm deeply disappointed in the university. I'm a student here and I really believe the university has an obligation to take concrete actions to deal with the poisoned environment on campus."

The university found itself at the centre of controversy when Elmasry appeared on CTS' Michael Coren Show on Oct. 19 and stated all Israelis older than 18 are part of the army and are therefore legitimate targets for attack. Later, he attempted to backtrack by suggesting he was merely voicing an opinion commonly held by Palestinians.

Elmasry's comments created a national uproar and police said they would investigate whether he had violated the country's hate laws. Around the same time, UW president David Johnston denounced Elmasry's views as "abhorrent" and said the dean of science, George Dixon, would investigate.

Last week Dixon announced he was satisfied with Elmasry's latest retraction and apology, saying "no formal discipline will be imposed." Dixon said that in deciding to forgo sanctions, the university took into account Elmasry's lengthy service as a member of the engineering faculty and his assurance the comments would not be repeated.

In a statement addressed to Dixon that was released last week, Elmasry went further than earlier attempts to clarify his controversial views. He said his comments on the Michael Coren Show "were totally unacceptable. They have understandably offended members of Canada's Muslim, Jewish, Palestinian and Arab communities and Canadians at large. They have also offended members of the University of Waterloo community.

"I offer my unconditional apology to all these communities for the statements I made and for the distress they have caused. I categorically retract the statements… with respect to the targeting of civilians. The statements were an aberration."

Bernie Farber, executive director of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, said in declining to discipline Elmasry, the university had failed to "draw a line in the sand."

"Surely it's not acceptable to suggest that Israelis over 18 are subject to murder," he said. "How comfortable are Israelis going to feel in his classroom? To say they accept his apology is frankly not enough. There has to be some action taken."

Farber said Congress is working with Jewish students on campus to investigate alternative complaint mechanisms and said Congress will seek a meeting with Johnston to discuss the university's position.

"We had hoped that the president, given the statements he made, would have taken [this] more seriously. I don't think the outcome suggests they took this seriously."

Chervinsky, who is an Israeli citizen, said Elmasry had managed to undo ongoing efforts to make Jewish and Israeli students feel more comfortable and open about their identities on campus.

Noting that Elmasry serves as a student advisor in the school's Middle East studies program, Chervinsky wondered, "How can Israeli students sit with him and ask his advice? How can an Israeli student feel comfortable with someone who said it's alright to kill you?

"I am deeply worried that if something significant isn't done by the university, the environment will deteriorate." He said he'd already been in contact with Toronto high school students who've told him they are reconsidering UW as an education option.

Adler, meanwhile, questioned the sincerity of Elmasry's apology. "What we would like to see is perhaps a program on campus where the professor can publicly apologize and explain to the student body why he was wrong in what he said, to be sure the apology is sincere and not simply a gambit to keep his position," he said.

Bridging the gap between psychiatry, religion

By ALISA MITCHELL
Special to The CJN

The problem with combining Orthodox Judaism with psychiatry is that the two are incompatible, says Dr. David Greenberg, director of the community mental health centre at the Herzog Hospital in Jerusalem.

An expert on the complex relationship between psychiatry and religion, Greenberg recently shared his knowledge and advice on working in the haredi community with mental health workers in Toronto.

In an interview arranged by the Canadian Friends of the Herzog Hospital, Greenberg, author of Sanity and Sanctity: Mental Health Work among the Ultra Orthodox in Jerusalem, discussed the unique nature of his work.

> Many patients feel there is a certain stigma attached to seeking help, and many fear that it will reflect negatively on them in the community

"Orthodox society is hierarchical. It is believed that God is the healer of the heart and soul, not psychiatrists," he said.

"As a result, many of these communities have an underlying suspicion towards the practice of psychiatry and have major difficulties bringing their soul to the attention of a therapist," said Greenberg.

He added that many patients feel there is a certain stigma attached to seeking help, and many fear that it will reflect negatively on them in the community.

The clinic usually sees more men than women, as the modesty expected of women in the Orthodox communities prevents them from coming, he said.

One of the most common and more socially acceptable reasons for seeking help is that men are unable to continue studying Torah, said Greenberg.

In these situations the men feel more comfortable coming to the clinic because the rest of the community is usually aware of this problem and thus the patient does not fear being exposed.

A unique aspect of his job is that many of his patients want to confer with their rabbi prior to accepting his advice for treatment, he said.

While psychiatrists are accustomed to a patient taking time to think about a suggested course of treatment, the desire to consult their rabbi can be interpreted as a challenge to the doctor's authority.

"All patients are in charge of themselves and have the right to make the final decision. Consulting their rabbi is just a version of this."

In his book, Greenberg describes how he learned to overcome these challenges.

He discusses the structure he developed that enables him to work effectively with this community – a structure that is based on entering into the patients' world with the idea that "any intervention has to be consistent with the authorities and practices of their society."

Greenberg's message to mental health workers is to encourage them to gain knowledge and understanding of the society from which a patient originates.

"Every culture is one unto itself. We must find the beauty in every society.

"Accordingly, therapists must go beyond respecting the individual."

They must also respect the group from which a patient comes and the world in which they live, no matter how foreign it may seem.

If therapists make this effort, patients who want help but are fearful of seeking it will come, he said.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. Is dried fruit a good snack? My kids and I love it.

A. Dried fruit is a popular snack and it is definitely healthier than chips or candy. The only thing you need to be aware of is that it can add up in calories and sugar and not be very filling. Add some nuts to it and you will probably feel full for longer and eat less, plus you'll get the benefit of protein from the nuts.

Q. My daughter is in Grade 1. I try to send her a variety of healthy and interesting lunches, but she brings them home uneaten most days. What should I send for better results ?

A. I believe very strongly that the most important thing about a child's lunch is that he or she will eat it. Next comes how nutritious it is. We really haven't won when we send a beautiful nutritious lunch and it is uneaten. Our children need to eat at school, so send something that your daughter will eat, even if it's boring and even if it's the same thing every day. Ask her what she wants and make your life easy. Send what she requests. Variety can come later.

Q. Which are the best nuts to snack on?

A. Almonds are excellent, as are walnuts, but you can also enjoy pecans, pistachios, hazelnuts or filberts and peanuts. Remember to add nuts to salads, stir fries, yogurt, baking and cereal, as they are very healthful.

Q. My family is big on pizza. We order it often because it is quick, and I think it is relatively healthy. How should I order it to make it as healthy as possible?

A. Most pizza places now are doing a great job of offering many healthy options. First, most offer whole wheat crust as well as thin crust which are both good choices. Then, load on as many veggies as possible, avoid meat and even ask for less cheese. Many pizza places do a great job of really going light on the cheese when you make this request.

Sharon: Israel, Palestinians to meet on PA elections

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli and Palestinian officials will meet in coming days to discuss arrangements for the Palestinian election of a successor to PA president Yasser Arafat, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told lawmakers on Monday.

Also Monday, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom told visiting U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell that Israel will work with the Palestinian Authority to co-ordinate the handover of territory evacuated as part of the disengagement plan.

After meeting with Shalom and Sharon, Powell headed for the West Bank town of Jericho to hold talks with Palestinian leaders and visit a voter registration office.

European Union officials, meanwhile, said Monday the EU will send a mission to observe the Palestinian elections. The EU head office has allocated $3.25 million (US) for the mission, which will be made up of members of the European Parliament, headed by former French prime minister Michel Rocard.

The Palestinians have set the PA chairmanship election for Jan. 9, and have asked for Israel to redeploy its troops from West Bank and Gaza Strip cities ahead of the vote.

Sharon told the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee that the meetings between the Israeli and Palestinian officials would be held "to see what the Palestinians want in order for the elections to be held as scheduled," an aide quoted him as saying.

Shalom said Israel could immediately begin co-ordinating with the PA on security issues and preventing incitement. After the PA elections and an Israeli government decision to evacuate settlements, Shalom added, the sides could begin working together on the handover of territories, and on rebuilding Gaza and industrial zones in the area.

In Monday's meeting with Powell, Shalom also said Israel would do everything it could to allow Palestinian elections to take place, including easing travel restrictions in the West Bank and Gaza.

Shalom said after the meeting that it is in Israel's interest to see the Palestinian elections go forward.

"The first priority is the Palestinian election, which will hopefully bring about a Palestinian leadership with whom we can sit down and address all the issues on our agenda," he said. "I have reassured the secretary today that Israel will do everything in its power to ensure their smooth running."

Shalom said Israel would remove obstacles and that the Palestinians would have "freedom of movement" in the run-up to the elections, saying Israel would co-ordinate the arrangements with the Palestinians. He did not say whether Israel would pull back troops.

Powell also met Monday with Sharon, telling the prime minister that the United States wants to take advantage of new opportunities in the Middle East created by Arafat's death and that it supports Palestinian elections.

Powell said he "reaffirmed… President [George W.] Bush's determination to take advantage of the opportunity that presented itself in the aftermath of Chairman Arafat's death and we are focusing principally on the election that is coming up… on the ninth of January."

"I'm pleased at what I've heard from the prime minister and the foreign minister about Israel's willingness to co-operate and co-ordinate with the Palestinian Authority as they prepare for these elections," he said.

Powell reiterated that the Palestinians must rein in militants. "Violence must be ended," he said.

"This is a moment of opportunity… The big step ahead of us now is to assist the Palestinian people getting ready for the election," he told reporters aboard his plane.

"In my conversations with both sides, I'll be encouraging them to do everything they can to make sure this election comes off and that the maximum number of Palestinians get the opportunity to participate.

"Perhaps the things that we do or that they do will encourage a degree of co-operation that can spread into other areas," said Powell, who announced his resignation earlier this month.

It was Powell's first trip to the region in 18 months and signals a revival of U.S. peacemaking in the Middle East in the wake of Arafat's death Nov. 11.

Shul official shot dead in Antwerp

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ANTWERP — Moshe Yitzchak Naeh, 24, was shot Wednesday night in a Jewish neighbourhood here.

The British citizen was returning home from his work as a sexton at a local synagogue in the early morning hours when he was shot in the head outside his home. He was taken to a local hospital but later died of his wounds.

Belgian police told Jewish community leaders they are investigating every possible angle and do not yet know if the murder was anti-Semitic or stemmed from other motives. Naeh had 1,400 euros in his pocket, which the killer did not take.

Police rearranged their patrols in the port city to centre more on the neighbourhood close to Antwerp Central Station.

Naeh's funeral was held Friday at the Jewish cemetery on the Belgium-Netherlands border.

Antwerp's haredi community spokesperson, Pinchas Kornfeld, urged the community not to jump to conclusions, saying the police must be allowed to investigate and do their job.

"If it does turn out to be an anti-Semitic event, it is particularly serious," Kornfeld said.

Belgian Jewish community leader Philip Markievicz said the atmosphere was sombre following the murder, but the motives were still unclear.

The 17,000-strong Antwerp Jewish community sees few anti-Semitic events, but Jews are occasionally targeted. Four yeshiva students were attacked in July by youths of Arab descent. One of the four needed medical care for stab wounds.

The community was concerned about the murder, which took place in their neighbourhood, close to areas inhabited by Antwerp's large Muslim population, comprised mostly of North African immigrants.

Kornfeld told Ha'aretz last week that a recent report by Belgium's official anti-racism centre revealed 49 anti-Semitic incidents have been reported so far this year in Belgium. In 1999, there were only nine.

"There is clearly a rise in anti-Semitism, but I am not sure it is really five-fold. There may be more awareness now than in 1999, so the public reports more, as it has been asked to do," Kornfeld said.

There are now 30,000 Jews in Belgium out of a total population of 10 million. Amid concern that racial tension in the Netherlands was spilling over into Belgium, the federal prosecutor's office disclosed that Justice Minister Laurette Onkelinx had received a letter threatening her and two other politicians.

Authorities said last Wednesday that a senator of Moroccan origin, noted for criticizing radical Islamists, had been given police protection after receiving death threats.

In related developments, a Belgian Jewish soccer team filed a police complaint last week after anti-Semitic insults were hurled at players. Members of the Maccabi Brussels youth team were greeted with anti-Semitic chants on Oct. 30 when they arrived to play FC Haren, a mainly Turkish team also from the Brussels area, La Libre Belgique reported last Wednesday. The referee briefly stopped the match to warn the Haren players to cease the chanting or he would be forced to call off the game.

Following the match, parents and players continued the abuse, shouting "Heil Hitler" at the Jewish team. Maccabi officials wrote to the Belgian Football Association to condemn the incident.

Majority back withdrawal

Most Israelis support Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan to withdraw from Gaza, a Ha'aretz poll says. Some 61 per cent expressed support for the plan, even after the death of Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat. Of those who support the plan, 36 per cent favoured continuing with its implementation while simultaneously negotiating with new Palestinian leaders. About 25 per cent said Israel must go ahead with the plan without changing it. This position is widely supported by the voters of Labor, Shinui and Yahad, as well as by 60 per cent of Likud backers.

Israelis visit Mauritania

Under heavy security, an Israeli delegation opened an official visit last week to the western Sahara nation of Mauritania, the only Arab League member with a diplomat still posted in Israel.

Locusts hit Negev

Swarms of locusts hit agricultural areas in the Negev last Friday. The locusts advanced up the coasts of Egypt and Libya, through the Sinai Peninsula and into southern Israel in the preceding days. They were spotted in several areas along the Egypt-Israel border, in Kibbutz Kerem Shalom east of Rafah and in Kadesh Barne'a and Nitzana. A swarm also invaded Eilat, where residents took to the streets to observe the insects.

Border clash goes south

An Israeli tank killed three Egyptian police officers on the Gaza Strip border, mistaking them for Palestinian terrorists. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon apologized to Egypt's president for the incident in Rafah, a tinderbox town on the Gaza-Egypt border that sees regular arms smuggling and clashes. Israeli officials said a tank posted in Rafah was ordered to fire on a group of Palestinians who were spotted planting a mine overnight, but it mistakenly targeted the Egyptians.

Unrecognizable conversions

The government said it would not recognize non-Orthodox conversions performed in Israel, for purposes of the Law of Return. The state will formally present its opinion to the High Court of Justice, which is reviewing a case on the legitimacy of Reform and Conservative conversions performed inside Israel. Movement representatives responded angrily to the opinion.

Israel, NATO get closer

Israel could take part in NATO military exercises for the first time. NATO officials have asked Israel to take part in exercises, as well as anti-terror activities such as patrols in the Mediterranean, Ha'aretz reported. Israel's inclusion is part of efforts to increase the treaty group's "Mediterranean dialogue." The dialogue includes six Muslim nations: Egypt, Jordan, Tunisia, Algeria, Morocco and Mauritania.

Rash of anti-Semitic incidents rattles Argentine Jews

By FLORENCIA ARBISER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — Argentine Jewish leaders are wondering whether a string of recent anti-Semitic incidents indicates a growing trend of Jew-hatred.

Abraham Kaul, president of the AMIA central Jewish institution, couldn't hide his concern last week at a meeting with Jewish media.

At dawn last Sunday, swastikas and a picture of Hitler were found at the Jewish cemetery of Liniers. Last Monday, more graffiti – swastikas and threatening messages – were added.

The messages included "Kristallnacht 08/11/38" – a reference to the murderous pogrom that heralded the onset of the Nazis' most restrictive anti-Semitic policies – and "Movement Walther Darre," a reference to a former Nazi agriculture minister who was born in Argentina.

The attack on the Liniers cemetery, located on the outskirts of Buenos Aires and one of the country's oldest Jewish burial grounds, followed three previous attacks there this year, in which bronze plaques were stolen.

"Are these signs of an escalation of anti-Semitic violence in the region?" Kaul asked. What worried him most was that the incidents showed "something more than a soccer fan's ignorant anti-Semitic song. These demonstrations seem to be more learned."

At dawn last Monday, a Hitler drawing and Nazi inscriptions were found on a bus belonging to the Maimonides Jewish school.

The DAIA, the Jewish community's political umbrella organization, met with federal police to demand an explanation for why a 24-hour police presence at the cemetery couldn't prevent such attacks, and what could be done differently in the future.

Authorities said police were in the bathroom when the graffiti were painted.

Earlier this month, three other local Jewish institutions — the Hebraica Jewish club, Paso Temple and the Sephardic Congregation — received bomb threats, though the news was not made public to avoid spreading fear in a country where bombings destroyed the Israeli Embassy in 1992 and the AMIA Jewish community centre in 1994.

According to Claudio Avruj, the DAIA's executive director, there have been more than 100 incidents of anti-Semitic graffiti in Buenos Aires this year.

But he stressed that, "DAIA does not believe there is a Nazi escalation. We think the past week was a special week with [Palestinian Authority president] Yasser Arafat's funeral, the Kristallnacht commemoration and the appeal of the AMIA trial acquittal sentence."

The last reference was to the community's decision to appeal the acquittal of five locals accused of complicity in the 1994 AMIA bombing. The attack, which killed 85 people and injured 300, remains unsolved.

Beyond the timing of the recent incidents, however, there has been a rise in the intensity of anti-Semitic incidents this year.

A few months ago, a Buenos Aires city legislator called one of her office employees a "shitty Jew," but was not punished.

Two weeks ago, an Argentine rabbi was giving a university lecture when a dozen people in the audience stood up and gave the Nazi salute.

In September, a 16-year-old student who brought a gun to class killed three classmates and wounded five. Though the victims weren't Jewish, the student later told a psychologist that he was moved to act because he admired Hitler.

Jewish officials are putting aside differences among their organizations to search for ways to fight such occurrences.

"Although we have clear political differences with the DAIA, we will act together in the demand to live freely and in peace," said AMIA's Kaul.

Last Wednesday evening, leaders of DAIA and AMIA were to meet with the governor of Buenos Aires province and security officials to find out what happened at the cemetery and what is being done to investigate the incidents.

DAIA is also meeting this week with city security officials on how police can prevent future such incidents.

Mossad changes course under Dagan

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

HERZLIYAH — On a stormy night in 1950, five-year-old Holocaust survivor Meir Huberman perched atop the bucking stern of an immigrant ship and prayed to reach Israel's shore safely. He did.

Now renamed Dagan and toughened by almost a half-century defending the Jewish state, that son of Russian refugees heads one of the world's most fearsome secret services: Mossad.

Evidence is mounting that Dagan has restored Mossad's reputation for deadly derring-do – despite the diplomatic risks for Israel.

Since Dagan was made spymaster in 2002 by his army colleague Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, at least four Arab terrorists have died in foreign operations widely attributed to Mossad.

Most recently, Hamas military strategist Izzadin Sheikh Khalil was killed in Damascus in a car bombing for which Israeli security sources admitted responsibility – the first time Jerusalem had mounted an assassination in Syria's capital.

"Israel is in the paradoxical situation of not having a death penalty but allowing itself to target Arab terrorists outside its borders with almost complete impunity," Gad Shimron, a 10-year Mossad veteran, told JTA. "Meir Dagan fully subscribes to this thinking, unlike some of his predecessors."

A retired general of compact build and few words, Dagan has stayed in the shadows since taking over Mossad. But an interview he gave in 1998, while serving as counterterrorism adviser in the Prime Minister's Office, was instructive.

"In my opinion, no terrorist should feel immune, anywhere," he told Channel Two television. "I think that a person's life is forfeited the moment he decides to adopt" terrorist tactics.

It was an attitude that, to many, seemed warranted after Al Qaeda blew up an Israeli-owned hotel and tried to shoot down an Israeli passenger jet in Kenya in November 2002. Sixteen people died in the hotel bombing, but the toll easily could have been hundreds more had the plane been hit. Sharon gave Dagan a new mandate to hunt down Israel's enemies abroad.

The news was not well received in Europe, which after the massacre of Israeli athletes at the 1972 Munich Olympics, had weathered Mossad assassinations of Palestinian fugitives on its soil.

The Swedish Parliament held an emergency session at which some lawmakers urged that Israel be told that as a civilized country it should not resort to hit teams.

Dagan was undeterred. Mossad tripled its recruitment, even launching a website where would-be spies can apply. And, security sources say, much of the agency's annual budget of some $350 million has been diverted from traditional intelligence gathering and analysis to field operations and "special tasks."

"As someone who is privy to the facts, but is not at liberty to divulge them, I can say this with complete authority: the Mossad under Meir Dagan has undergone a revolution in terms of organization, intelligence and operations," Ehud Yatom, a member of the Knesset subcommittee on secret services, wrote in the Ma'ariv newspaper. "And he is far from done."

Over the past two years, Mossad has foiled three major Islamist attacks intended against Israeli targets in Africa, and another in Thailand, according to sources.

"Meir is the quintessential contractor," said Amram Mitzna, a former Labor Party chairman who served with Dagan during Israel's military occupation of southern Lebanon. "Once given a mission, he is simply unstoppable."

But the counterterrorist quest has not been allowed to supersede another Israeli priority – tracking Iran's nuclear program. The result is a caseload that, on at least one occasion, appears to have caused Mossad an embarrassing slip-up.

Earlier this year, two Israelis were caught in Auckland trying to obtain a New Zealand passport by assuming the identity of a bedridden local man. They pleaded guilty and spent six months in jail.

Accusing the convicts of being Mossad agents – a charge neither confirmed nor denied in Jerusalem – New Zealand suspended diplomatic ties with Israel.

Intelligence experts speculated that the Israelis were under pressure to obtain a New Zealand passport, with the relatively free access it would grant its holder to Arab countries and Iran, for an impending mission. The two may not have had sufficient training in spycraft, since the younger of them was barely 30.

"Our zest to get the enemy at all costs sometimes costs us dearly in terms of international standing," said Yigal Eyal, a former Mossad operative who now lectures on counterterrorism at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

The price in prestige has had ramifications closer to home, within the high walls of Mossad's Herzliyah headquarters.

Dagan succeeded Efraim Halevy, who as agency director emphasized back-door diplomacy over field operations – for example, brokering Israel's peace accord with Jordan.

For many in the Israeli intelligence community, this year's Damascus assassination and New Zealand debacle are all too reminiscent of the Mossad's botched 1997 attempt on the life of Hamas politburo chief Khaled Meshaal in Amman. Halevy owed his promotion to that episode, as it forced the resignation of then-Mossad director Danny Yatom.

A Channel Two expose said around 200 Mossad operatives, including seven section heads, have resigned in protest since Dagan took over. This was contested by one former spy, who attributed most of the walkouts to a change in Israeli pension laws that made early retirement attractive to senior staff.

Another claim made in the television report was that Dagan had jeopardized Mossad's working reputation by declining, on one occasion, to co-operate with former CIA chief George Tenet.

Yad Vashem posts names of 3 million Shoah victims

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Yad Vashem Holocaust Martyrs and Heroes' Remembrance Authority has unveiled a section on its website that gives Internet users access to biographical information on three million of the six million Jews killed by Nazi Germany and its collaborators, making it the most comprehensive database of its kind.

The special section of the Yad Vashem site (www.yadvashem.org), which was formally launched Monday in the presence of Education Minister Limor Livnat, digitizes the centre's 50 years of work in compiling information on Holocaust victims. The list can already be accessed in both English and Hebrew.

The database is partly based on more than two million "pages of testimony" submitted since 1950 to the Yad Vashem memorial in Jerusalem by survivors or family members and friends of Jews killed in the Holocaust.

Information was also gleaned from historical documentation, such as correspondence between Nazi officials and lists of inmates at death camps, Yad Vashem says on the website.

"Building the database is a work in progress," the Web site said, calling the project a final act of respect.

"Yad Vashem undertook to retrieve the names of the Jewish victims and to preserve their memory," a message on the site declares. "This is the moral duty of the Jewish people, our last respects to the victims."

The museum put some 1,500 people to work a decade ago, turning written testimony into digital information, said Yad Vashem spokesperson Esti Yaari.

In the past 12 months, workers focused on getting all the data onto the Internet. A team of experts included geographers, genealogists and linguists worked on the project.

"We are also launching an 11th-hour drive to get more information because we realize that time is running out," Yaari said.

"Millions of names that appear in a wide variety of historical documents have not yet been identified or recorded in the database. Many additional names still linger only in the memories of survivors or in the lore of their families."

After entering a victim's name in English or Hebrew, a paragraph of biographical data – date and place of birth, marital status, residence, and, if known, date and place of death – appears along with a link to an image of the "page of testimony" submitted to Yad Vashem.

Session looked at Canadian Jews

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

2004 General Assembly

Barrie, Ontario's Jewish population grew by 240.5 per cent from 1991 to 2001, and now has more Jews than either Saskatoon or Regina.

That was one of the statistics offered by demographer Jack Jedwab, executive director of the Association for Canadian Studies, at the General Assembly of United Jewish Communities (GA) in Cleveland earlier this month.

In a session called "Canadian Jews Toward 2011: Demography and Identity," Jedwab noted that a growing number of Jewish low-income seniors in large cities will require increasing support.

He also said he was surprised by the "substantial" extent of Jewish populations' move to the suburbs, justifying satellite services in those areas.

Mark Gurvis, executive director of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, appeared at the same session, which was moderated by Sharon Horlick, president of the Windsor Jewish Federation and Community Centre.

"I was struck by how different British Columbia is from the rest of the country," said Gurvis, citing a greater percentage of Jews who are dispersed in the province compared to other major cities and the resulting need for federation to begin to service those pockets.

In Vancouver, as in Toronto, there are Jewish immigrants from places like Central and South America, South Africa and Israel, with strong Zionist backgrounds and strong connections to Israel, he said. "I think it strengthens the extent to which Israel will be a common ground."

Other Canadian speakers at the three-day meeting included Ted Sokolsky, president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto; Ed Morgan, president of Canadian Jewish Congress; Irshad Manji, author of The Trouble With Islam; and Marc Gold, vice-president, FEDERATION CJA of Montreal and chair of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Two Toronto rabbis – Rabbi Jay Kelman and Rabbi Elyse Goldstein – were among the recipients of United Jewish Communities rabbinical awards and among the 100 Canadian delegates, not including 60 Canadian students.

Those representing smaller Jewish communities found the conference particularly invigorating, said Esther Marcus, executive director of the London Jewish Federation.

In addition to the benefits of the sessions and networking, attending the GA can also be a team-building experience, said Harvey Kessler, Marcus' counterpart in Windsor, which has a Jewish population of about 1,500. "We're a stronger team [after the GA], and then we can be a model for our community," he said, referring to his four-person delegation.

For David Kroft, vice-president of community relations for the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and one of seven Canadian winners of young leadership awards, the GA offered "a fierce sense of pride in the North American Jewish community."

Elayne Fremes, a first-year University of Toronto student, said the timing of the GA was not good for her, but it "seemed like such an amazing opportunity. I'm interested in working in the Jewish community in the future."

Another student, Aviva Zimmerman, a Calgarian who is studying at Ryerson University, said she was at the GA to "get reinvigorated with Jewish activism, to learn, and to meet other enthusiastic Jewish youth." Because of her long hours as a theatre student, she finds it difficult to attend many programs in Toronto.

Marc Abergel, a law student at the Université de Montréal and co-founder of its Jewish Law Students' Association, said the meeting offered students "the tools to advocate properly."

The best part, said Julie Shulman, vice-president of the Israel advocacy group at the University of Western Ontario, is "knowing the adult world is behind us."

Focus on leadership, young adult involvement

The General Assembly of United Jewish Communities (GA) is rendered "immediately different from most synagogues" by its forums featuring Jews with differing opinions, said right-wing commentator Dennis Prager.

Speaking recently in Cleveland at the 73rd annual GA with author Letty Cottin Pogrebin on a panel described by a GA delegate as "really hot," Prager said he is not generally invited to Orthodox synagogues (with the exception of Chabad), and faces a similar situation with the Reform movement, because of his differing level of observance in the former case, and his conservative political views in the latter.

In an animated exchange, Cottin Pogrebin defended her "pro-peace" stance and called for a stop to "ad hominem attacks" including the use of labels such as "anti-Jewish, anti-Israel, even a self-hating Jew" for those holding liberal views.

But despite that panel and a number of politically oriented sessions concerning both the United States and Israel, the main focus of this year's GA was leadership and Jewish community involvement, particularly regarding young people.

Johanna Herman, president of Hillel at the University of Toronto, and Rachel Birenbaum, co-ordinator of Tzedec Hillel for Hillel of Greater Toronto, spoke on a panel of their increased Jewish involvement as a result of Birthright (for Herman) and Jewish service programs (for Birenbaum).

Co-panellist Isaac Grody-Patinkin, the national organizer of United Students for Fair Trade and a New York University student who "did not grow up in federation-land," objected to the session's title, "The New Post-Modern, Sometimes Abstract, Judaism." It embodied "a lot of paternalism," he felt, interpreting the meaning as, "Come share your experience, but this isn't real Judaism."

Herman told The CJN later that, while she does feel welcomed by the mainstream Jewish community, "everybody has to find their own way of involvement. For some it's not going to be federation or Hillel."

Moderator Rabbi Andy Bachman of Reboot: A Network for Jewish Innovation, noted that although there are follow-up programs for Birthright participants, there were unofficial get-togethers on a regular basis in eight American cities, organized through the website www.meetup.com.

Herman said later her generation was more likely to take initiative than to be joiners.

Author David Stillman, at a session on "When Generations Collide" (also the name of his book), said that 62 per cent of Generation Xers (those born from 1965 to 1991) have never been asked to give money or volunteer. "Before we dismiss them, have we even asked them?"

He called Gen Xers "the most skeptical generation ever," based on their exposure to television and the number of major institutions they have seen undermined. "To say to them, 'That's the way it's always been done,' is going to be the kiss of death.

"Xers are great workers, but they want to work in a different way," he said. "Once you respect the skepticism, then you can learn to work with it."

That generation also tends to put family first, he noted. "Take opportunities for the whole family to get involved."

He also urged participants to keep older members of the community involved, particularly as volunteers. Of those born before 1946, 80 per cent give money, but only 31 per cent volunteer, he said. "We cannot afford to lose an ounce of their experience, energy and wisdom."

Looking to the future as part of a panel called "Send Every Kid to Israel and Forever Change American Jewish Life," Gil Troy, professor of history at McGill University, said, "We have to start looking at Israel as an answer to our identity issues." —F.K.

Excellent Broadway documentary now available on DVD

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Broadway, "the Great White Way," has had an incalculable impact on culture in the United States, judging by the recent six-part PBS series, produced by Michael Kantor and hosted by Julie Andrews.

What comes shining through Broadway: The American Musical – a first-class documentary based on archival footage, newsreels, home movies, still photos, original cast recordings and interviews – is one indisputable fact: Jews, from Florenz Ziegfeld and Al Jolson to Adolph Green and Stephen Sondheim, have played a profound role in the making of the Broadway musical.

Now available on DVD (along with other related products such as CDs and a companion book), Broadway is a superb, vastly entertaining production, the first comprehensive series on the history of the American musical.

Adopting a chronological approach, Broadway begins at the turn of the 19th century and ends with today's productions.

What becomes abundantly clear, from the first episode, is that the sons of daughters of newly arrived Jewish immigrants were in the forefront of the creation of the musical.

Ziegfeld, whose trademark was The Ziegfield Follies, practically established the musical single-handedly. His 1927 production of Jerome Kern and Oscar Hammerstein's masterpiece, Showboat, was a landmark in the annals of Broadway.

And who can forget Irving Berlin, the prodigious songwriter whose lyrics still resound, or George Gershwin, whose songs and symphonies are as fresh today as they were in the 1920s and 1930s?

Broadway pays tribute to the inimitable comedienne Fanny Brice, whose Yiddish-inflected performance of My Man assumed legendary proportions, and to the songwriting team of Lorenz Hart and Richard Rogers, whose hit Thou Swell enlivened A Connecticut Yankee.

The iconic Depression-era song, Brother, Can You Spare a Dime, was composed by Yip Harburg, and Oklahoma!, the 1943 Broadway play, introduced a brilliant new partnership of Rogers and Hammerstein. They wrote the songs for, among other plays, South Pacific, Annie Get Your Gun and There's No Business Like Show Business.

As Broadway wends its way into the 1950s, two fresh faces, Alan Jay Lerner and Frederick Loewe, pop up with My Fair Lady. And on the eve of Hammerstein's death, The Sound of Music has its premiere.

West Side Story, with music by Leonard Bernstein and choreography by Jerome Robbins, takes Broadway by storm.

Fiddler on the Roof, based on Shalom Aleichem's stories of the shtetl, becomes the longest-running show after opening in 1964.

Irving Berlin

Cabaret, directed by Hal Prince, wows audiences with its portrayal of the last days of Weimar Germany. Joseph Papp's Hair is the first musical whose entire score consists of rock music.

A Chorus Line, a play that charts the life of an itinerant dancer and whose score is written by Marvin Hamlisch, breaks attendance records.

Mel Brooks, that old trouper, dazzles Broadway with The Producers, which is described as the first must-see musical in decades.

David Merrick (Hello, Dolly and 42nd Street), is given his due as a producer. Jerry Herman, rated as the most successful composer of the 1960s, hits paydirt yet again with La Cage aux Folles, the first gay musical to make a profit.

The Lion King, directed by Julie Taymor, imagines a future without racism, and Rent, directed by Michael Greif, charts the AIDS epidemic.

Broadway, one of the finest documentaries since Ken Burns' epic series on the U.S. civil war, can be ordered at www.pbs.org/wnet/broadway/shop.html.

Chanukah Gifts

Books highlight Canadian history, life and culture

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The books discussed here deal with aspects of history and Canadian life and culture. All five offer great reading, but the first three are also coffee-table books with strong visual elements. Each book is worth consideration as a Chanukah gift. Enjoy!

I've spent hours happily perusing Charis Cotter's Toronto Between the Wars: Life in the City, 1919-1939 (Firefly), a wonderful album of photographs and pungent commentaries that capture the quintessential character and colour of both the place and the era.

Art Deco skyscrapers arose in the Toronto of the jazz age, which was a time of Prohibition, changing morals and considerable municipal expansion and improvement. The '30s brought the Depression, social unrest, more skyscrapers and the continued replacement of horses with automobiles. Toronto Between the Wars portrays a bustling city in hundreds of fascinating archival photographs that show street scenes, buildings, parades, crowds, elegant mansions and derelict slums, and many ordinary citizens in extraordinary moments.

There are even a few glimpses of the old Jewish community around Spadina Avenue and Kensington Market, and a photo of the old Hebrew Men of England Synagogue on Spadina, judiciously balanced with items pertaining to the Italian, Greek and other ethnic communities. Anyone who loves Toronto will find this book well worth browsing.

Similarly, all of us who love this country will delight in Charlotte Gray's The Museum Called Canada: 25 Rooms of Wonder (Random House). This glorious, lavishly illustrated, full-colour volume presents a compilation of artifacts from Canada's past that could never, in real life, exist in any one museum.

As conceived by editor-curator Sara Angel, the book is a virtual museum of 25 rooms, beginning 2.1 billion years ago with "Fossil Hall" and culminating in the late-20th century with the "Earth and Sky Atrium." Anyone who has read any of Gray's previous works, such as Flint and Feather or Sisters in the Wilderness, will know what a wonderful tour guide she makes as she intelligently describes hundreds of objects of pop culture and high art, as well as pieces of historic and scientific provenance.

Whether she's discussing Benjamin West's famous and fanciful painting of The Death of Wolfe on the Plains of Abraham, or the multitude of worthy artifacts related to Expo '67, Gray is adept at capturing our imagination and showing us many Canadian cultural icons in a new, refreshing and intimate way.

Another sumptuous picture-book from Random House is Canada's House: Rideau Hall and the Invention of a Canadian Home by Margaret MacMillan, Marjorie Harris and Anne L. Desjardins in conversation with Adrienne Clarkson and John Ralston Saul. Filled with archival photos of house, garden, art and furniture, and containing a section on Canadian recipes, the book should appeal to anyone with a passion for Canadian architecture, horticulture, art, cuisine and 19th-century refinery.

Ego and Ink: The Inside Story of Canada's National Newspaper War by Chris Cobb (McClelland and Stewart) is sumptuous in a different way – verbally rather than visually. This delicious, richly told history offers tons of fascinating ink on a spectrum of newspaper personalities from Christie Blatchford to Jan Wong as it details the amazing story of Conrad Black's brilliant and ambitious media venture, the National Post newspaper.

Cobb spoke at length with dozens of writers and others in researching this alluring and multifaceted book. Ego and Ink delivers the inside dope on celebrity columnists such as Mordecai Richler, who reportedly often turned in less-than-glowing pieces but discouraged editors from tampering with his prose; Robert Fulford, who gleefully defected from the arrogant Globe and Mail to grab what he saw as a once-in-a-lifetime journalistic opportunity at the Post; and Blatchford and her close friend Rosie DiManno of the Toronto Star, who are depicted as the "Thelma and Louise" of Canadian journalism.

Other well-known names – Richard Addis, Barbara Amiel, Issy Asper, Rebecca Eckler, John Fraser, Edward Greenspon, John Bentley Mays and Ken Whyte – lend vitality to the tale. For anyone in the journalistic profession in Canada, and for anyone who reads the Post religiously, Ego and Ink offers an irresistible back-story.

Former Maclean's editor and bestselling author Peter C. Newman has produced an equally lively (if at 732 pages, somewhat heftier) volume with his memoir, Here Be Dragons: Telling Tales of People, Passion and Power (McClelland and Stewart). In his famously flamboyant prose style, Newman tells the story of his life from his early years as a Czechoslovakian Jew whose family dramatically escaped the Nazis to his rise as a writer, editor and chronicler of the Canadian establishment.

One of the most influential journalists of his day, Newman revitalized the moribund Maclean's from a monthly feature magazine into a weekly news magazine. He has also sold more than two million books. If political figures such as Pierre Trudeau, John Diefenbaker, Lester Pearson and Brian Mulroney take center stage in his memoir, his four wives are close behind. Tellingly, he credits his second wife, Christina McCall, with influencing him to alter his prose style "from reporting about facts to writing about feelings."

Chanukah Gifts

New books range far and wide

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

If you're thinking of an appropriate gift for Chanukah, look no more. Think of a book. The following books, published recently, range far and wide.

Masterworks of the Jewish Museum (Yale University Press), edited by Maurice Berger and Joan Rosenbaum, is published to coincide with the 100th anniversary of this stellar institution. This handsome, lavishly illustrated coffee-table volume showcases art works and ritual objects from the museum's excellent collection. As you leaf through its pages, you'll find marriage contracts, Torah decorations, Chanukah lamps, spice containers and works by artists of the calibre of Marc Chagall and Moritz Daniel Oppenheim.

The Annex: The Story of a Toronto Neighbourhood (The Boston Mills Press), by Jack Batten, is an exercise in nostalgia. Batten, a well-known Toronto journalist and author who has lived in the Annex since 1967, pays tribute to a funky, historical neighbourhood – and site of the refurbished Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre – whose architectural history runs the gamut from Victorian to post-modern.

The Travel Book: A Journey Through Every Country in the World (Lonely Planet) is just that, a leisurely tour of the globe from Afghanistan to Zimbabwe, with numerous stops in such countries as Canada and Israel. Beautifully illustrated, with striking photographs and easily readable maps, this 444-page compendium starts with a snapshot of the country under review, the best time to visit and its essential experiences and particular trademarks. National food and drinks are listed, as are recommended books to read and surprises to savour.

It should be perused and/or read in conjunction with two Canadian-centric books – Collins Canadian Discovery World Atlas (HarperCollins), ideal for home and office reference, and Ian Gill's Haida Gwaii: Journey Through the Queen Charlotte Islands (Raincoast Books), a pleasing blend of commentary, history and natural science. David Nunuk's moody photographs are superb.

Gulag: Life and Death Inside the Soviet Concentration Camps 1917-1990 (Firefly Books), by Polish photographer Tomasz Kizny, documents a tragic dimension of the former Soviet Union: the remote, far-flung camps that bottled up and consumed dissidents, some of whom were Jews. This is a riveting book that brings to mind Joseph Stalin's cynical remark, "One death is a tragedy, but a million is a statistic."

Deadly Medicine: Creating the Master Race (University of North Carolina Press) lays bare the nefarious role German doctors, scientists, health-care officials and academics played in supporting and implementing Hitler's program of racial eugenics that culminated with the Holocaust. This valuable, illustrated book complements a United States Holocaust Memorial Museum exhibit that sheds light on a dark period.

Jehovah's Witnesses and the Third Reich (University of Toronto Press), by M. James Penton of the University of Lethbridge, explores a little-touched aspect of Nazi Germany. Raised as a Jehovah's Witness, he claims in this thoroughly researched study that the leaders of this Christian religious sect colluded, in fact, with the Nazis, and that they referred to Jews as "the representatives of Satan the Devil."

American Soldier (HarperCollins) is the story of Tommy Franks, the U.S. general who led U.S. forces into Afghanistan and Iraq in 2001 and 2003, respectively. This is not only an autobiography, but an analysis of two pivotal military campaigns that shook the world. Franks' comments on the Arab-Israeli conflict are balanced.

Battle Lines (Thomas Allen), edited by J.L. Granatstein and Norman Hilmer, reviews major military events in Canada's history as viewed through eyewitnesses. This is an important contribution from two distinguished historians.

Rothstein: The Life, Times and Murder of the Criminal Genius Who Fixed the 1919 World Series (Carroll & Graf), by David Pietrusza, recaps the career of Arnold Rothstein, the legendary American Jewish gangster who was gunned down in 1928.

Your Memory: A User's Guide (Firefly Books), by Alan Baddeley, is the perfect self-help book. Packed with information, anecdotes and exercises, it defines memory, explains how it works and recommends how to make it more reliable.

Krakatoa: The Day the World Exploded (HarperCollins) examines the cataclysmic 1883 eruption of an Asian volcano that destroyed an island, killed 36,417 people and was heard thousands of miles away. The author, Simon Winchester, is a great writer who tells a fascinating story in grand style.

Bark Canoes: The Art and Obsession of Tappan Adney (Firefly Books) turns on the man who single-handedly preserved the precious legacy of North American Indian bark canoe builders and their craft.

Aspects of Liberal Judaism: Essays in Honour of John D. Rayner (Vallentine Mitchell), edited by Rabbi David Goldberg and Edward Kessler, was published on the 80th birthday of an influential British Reform rabbi. The essays, written by his friends and colleagues, deal with a variety of pertinent issues. A companion volume, Their Heads in Heaven (Vallentine Mitchell), by Rabbi Louis Jacobs, is a rigorous examination of the chassidic movement.

The Limits of Orthodox Theology (The Littman Library of Jewish Civilization), by Marc Shapiro, is a stimulating reappraisal of Maimonides' 13 principles, a cornerstone of Orthodox Jewish theology.

Polish-Jewish Literature in the Interwar Years (Syracuse University Press), by Eugenia Prokop-Janiec, is a scholarly account of a rarely discussed topic. It is translated from the Polish by Abe Shenitzer, a York University professor emeritus.

The Labor of Love (Stanford University Press) is an examination of the plays of the late Israeli playwright and gadfly Hanoch Levin.

Hotel Tiberias (HarperCollins), by Sebastian Hope, is an absorbing memoir by a British writer whose grandfather was a Palestinian-born German hotelier whose Christian evangelical maternal grandparents immigrated to the Holy Land in 1868. The book unfolds against the backdrop of life in Palestine in the 19th and 20th centuries. A very unusual and satisfying book.

A PASSION FOR HOLIDAY
"find something...wow!"
I love to find that special thing for someone that they normally wouldn't buy for themselves. The wrapping has to be special, it has to be an event opening it. And it's very important that the gift exceeds the wrapping, that it's a climax – when you open it up and find something...wow!

Lodz Ghetto Album preserves photographs of a terrible period

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Henryk Ross was no ordinary photographer.

From 1940 on, he was one of only two official photographers in the Lodz ghetto, the last to be liquidated in Nazi-occupied Poland.

A sports and general press photographer before the war, Ross and his colleague, Mendel Grossman, worked for the Jewish Council, which managed the ghetto for the Nazis.

Employed by the department of statistics, Ross' job was to take official propaganda photos and to produce identification pictures of ghetto residents.

With access to cameras, film and darkrooms, he roamed the streets of Lodz – renamed Litzmannstadt by the Germans – to document life in the squalid ghetto, an area of roughly 1.5 square miles.

Jewish police in the Lodz ghetto

When it became clear that the ghetto – administered by Chaim Rumkowski, one of the most controversial figures of the Holocaust – would be emptied, Ross buried his 3,000 prints and negatives so that they could bear witness to the Nazi atrocities.

When the Germans liquidated the ghetto, known as the antechamber of hell, its 70,000 remaining inhabitants were dispatched to Auschwitz. Lodz's prewar Jewish population had been 223,000.

Ross survived the deportations by going into hiding. He was liberated in January 1945 by the Red Army. Shortly afterward, he recovered many of his photographs and negatives. Some had already been destroyed.

In 1950, he and his wife immigrated to Israel. There Ross circulated his photographs, some of which were published in a book, The Last Journey of the Jews of Lodz. He died in 1991, having catalogued his collection.

Six years after Ross' death, his son donated it to the Archive of Modern Conflict in London, England.

And now a selection of his photographs appears in a newly published book, Lodz Ghetto Album (Chris Boot Ltd.), with an informative introduction by Thomas Weber, a British historian.

These stark photographs mainly portray hunger, death and despair, and, occasionally, beauty.

We see the blasted remains of the Wolborska Street synagogue, dynamited by the Nazis in 1940, lying in mounds of pristine snow.

There are photographs of petty traders eking out an existence selling pots and pans.

Far more gruesomely, there are images of corpses and of people digging for food in the ground and lining up to be deported.

Ross' photograph of two stolid columns of Jewish policemen marching in formation, flanked by their overseers wearing black boots, is also chilling.

As hard as it may be to imagine, Ross also captured moments of levity and tenderness.

Amid a tangle of tree branches, a man and a woman locked in an embrace kiss each other. Two friends walk arm in arm, dreaded yellow stars sewn on the breasts of their suits. A woman lies contentedly in repose. Children sit around a table laden with food and drinks.

One presumes that the individuals in these soothing photographs were members of the privileged ghetto elite.

Lodz Ghetto Album is a valuable record of a terrible period in the annals of the Jewish people.

Thanks to Ross' skill as a photographer, this important facet of the Holocaust has been preserved for time immemorial.

Lloyd plays the blues with a Jewish twist

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

The blues, like love, is a universal language.

There was a time when the only credible blues artists were of African-American descent. Black musicians such as B.B. King revolutionized the genre with impassioned compositions and emotional electric guitar playing.

Then, in the 1960s, bands such as the Rolling Stones, the Yardbirds and John Mayall's Bluesbreakers, echoing the sounds of America's south, re-tooled the music into pop forms and introduced blues to suburban teenagers.

While Jews have certainly had plenty to sing the blues about, there remains a dearth of Jewish blues musicians. But there is one blues rocker coming up in the ranks – Lazer Lloyd. He and his band,The Folk Spirit Blues, have just released the CD Higher Ground. Recently they toured the United States and visited Toronto.

To categorize Lloyd's music as solely blues would be a disservice to the rollicking blend of rock, folk and country blues he successfully weaves together.

The first track on the album, Hey Hey, begins with the simple refrain "Hey, hey, it's a brand-new day," and sets the mood for the smooth, mellow bluesy feel of the rest of the album. It's the instrumental solo 2 a.m. that really makes his guitar playing shine.

Currently based in Beit Shemesh, Israel, Lloyd grew up in the small seaside town of Madison, Conn. He says he spent much of his time in the woods and by the water, creating musical styles that reflected his surroundings.

The multi-talented 31-year-old, who sings, writes his own material and plays both harmonica and guitar, says he was inspired early on by Santana, Stevie Ray Vaughan and George Benson.

Higher Ground, a smooth, satisfying album with sparkling guitar playing, also shows that Lazar has a wide range of old-school rock influences.

See You Smile sounds as if it was inspired by The Weight by Robbie Robertson (The Band). Got To Know is reminiscent of Canned Heat's On the Road Again and On the Edge evokes a Zeppelin-esque sound. Still, Lloyd has forged his own style, while borrowing deftly from the masters.

There are times on the disc, however, when Lloyd sings in the upper range, and the strain is apparent. What he lacks in vocal versatility, though, he makes up for in catchy harmonies and smooth finger-popping rhythms. But don't anticipate complicated razzle-dazzle or pop radio-friendly tunes. This isn't showy music or over-produced pap. It's simple, down-to-earth, old-fashioned "geetar" strumming. It's for listening to on a Sunday evening at a coffee shop or while driving down those lonesome highways with the windows rolled down.

Lloyd has released three albums in Hebrew, A New Song, Straight To You and For Your Sake, and, in English, The Rock Spirit Blues. He has played and recorded with the Israeli pop band Reva L'Sheva and chassidic minstrel Shlomo Carlebach.

Though the lyrical references to Judaism and Torah in Higher Ground are subtle for the most part, Lloyd's liner notes pay homage to the late Lubavitcher Rebbe Menachem Mendel Schneerson and Carlebach, whom he credits with inspiring him to perform.

As a multi-talented musician who combines blues with Jewish content, Lloyd stands out in the oversaturated music scene.

Former ballerina directs two plays side by side

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

When you're called upon to direct two plays at the same time, you better be on your toes…as is Eda Holmes, 43, a former ballet dancer and now a much sought after multi-award winning director.

Holmes is directing CanStage's Side By Side By Sondheim and Tarragon's Helen's Necklace.

Side By Side By Sondheim running from Nov. 25 – Dec. 18 at Bluma, 27 Front St. E., is Holmes's first production with CanStage, save for a workshop last year of The Miracle Man.

"Side By Side By Sondheim is a spectacular review of the early work of Stephen Sondheim; it covers all the music he wrote up through Pacific Overtures," she says.

"This is only the third musical I've done, my first one was Little Mercy's First Murder at the Tarragon and then I did Floyd Collins at Shaw Festival this summer, so, I'm just discovering them," she says.

"One thing I realize for myself that is kind of great is having danced all my life, I had such a strong connection to music and then when I left dance and started studying theatre, then directing, I got away from that for awhile. So, when I've come back to musical theatre it is so much a part of my life that I had forgotten. It's quite fulfilling and thrilling to work in musical theatre."

Helen's Necklace, originally written in French by Quebec playwright Carol Fréchette and translated by playwright John Murrell is currently onstage at Tarragon's Extra Space, 30 Bridgman Ave, until Dec. 12. It stars Tarragon's playwright-in-residence, actor Susan Coyne and Holmes' theatre school friend Raoul Bhaneja.

"Helen's Necklace is a one hour remount of a show I did here last year. It is a story of a woman who travels to Beirut on a conference and buys a necklace and then looses it. In the course of looking for the necklace discovers what loss really means to her through meeting people who have lost everything. It is a very theatrical, poetic piece," Holmes says.

Holmes comes from a Jewish family, but says she's not religious. "I recently worked with Richard Greenblatt and Diane Flacks on a piece for next season called Care. They both have rich Jewish traditions from their families, so since they create from their experience there was a very strong Jewish component to that piece, so it was interesting for me to revisit some of the things I've been so far from for all my adult life," she says.

HOLOCAUST RESISTANCE OPERA IN PERFORMANCE

Renowned composer Udo Zimmermann's one-act contemporary opera White Rose is being performed in Toronto on Sunday evening in commemoration of Holocaust Education Week.

White Rose was the name of an underground anti-fascist resistance group that printed and distributed protest leaflets against Adolf Hitler's regime in Germany in 1942 and 1943. The opera tells the story of brother and sister Hans and Sophie Scholl, White Rose members who were arrested and executed in February 1943.

For director-producer Judy Kopelow, the production offers an occasion to commemorate the many righteous Gentiles who saved thousands of Jews and in particular, "these young Germans who had the wisdom and courage to act against Hitler."

Kopelow relates that noted architect James Ingo Freed advised her to use light rather than constructed sets when staging the opera, which is set in the Munich-Stadelehim Prison. "When an architect of Mr. Freed's stature says, 'Do not build a set, just use light,' however great the challenge, you listen," she said.

MacMillan Theatre, Faculty of Music, University of Toronto, Edward Johnson Building, 80 Queen's Park Cres. Adults $25, students $18. Sunday, Nov. 28, 8 p.m. 416-978-8668.

Dostoevsky Coming to Stratford: Jason Sherman was reading The Brothers Karamazov by Fyodor Dostoevsky several years ago when a lightbulb went on in his head.

After winning approval from Stratford artistic director Richard Monette, the Toronto playwright began writing a play based on the famous 19th-century Russian novel. His first draft covered less than half of the book but contained about four hours' worth of material. After cutting some subplots, Sherman found it was possible to cram all of the book's action into a single evening of theatre.

In an incisive piece in the fall issue of the Stratford Festival's Fanfare magazine, Kelley Teahen charts the fascinating progress of this ambitious theatrical project as it makes its way towards an opening already slated for June 3, 2005, with previews beginning May 21.

Sherman and director Richard Rose have been furiously pruning and shaping the script after an initial public workshop two years ago. One more public and two private workshops were staged this year. The work in progress has already been cast and rehearsals are due to begin in March.

"I believe good playwriting is well-executed rewriting. Simple as that," Rose told Fanfare. "When actors begin to animate a play, vocally and on their feet, they show the playwright what he needs and doesn't need to make the story work."

For tickets, contact the Stratford box office at 1-800-567-1600. Website www.stratfordfestival.ca

Philip Roth's fiction takes on the big questions

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Philip Roth's most uncanny writing has relied on the proposition "What if?"

What if one could interview Kafka's whore (in The Professor of Desire)? What if one was transformed into a breast (The Breast)? What if the prospect of "diasporism" – a return to Europe by world Jewry – was a superior strategy to Zionism (Operation Shylock)?

Norman Ravvin

Even The Human Stain, a book without the fictional pyrotechnics of some of Roth's other work, begins with the premise – unlikely to some – that a light-skinned Coleman Silk, a black Newarker, can transform himself into Dean Silk, a New England Jewish academic.

Roth's new novel, The Plot Against America, takes the "what if" premise to new heights. In it, he re-imagines two crucial years in American history, between the summer of 1940 and the fall of 1942. Rather than a third Democratic presidency under Roosevelt, Roth imagines that Americans have elected Charles Lindbergh and his rabidly right wing running mate Burton K. Wheeler. The outcome for American Jews is disastrous, but to say more would ruin the plot for readers (something J.M. Coetzee does at great length in a recent New York Review of Books piece).

The "Books by" list fronting Roth's recent work is divided according to who narrates each novel. There are "Zuckerman Books," "Kepesh Books," and "Roth Books." The Plot Against America is a Roth Book. Little Philip Roth is its main protagonist, and it's through his eyes that we see the deterioration of American life that takes him and his family by brutal surprise.

But the novel's narrator possesses much of the retrospective irony and humour that we're used to finding in Roth's novels, as if we are gaining not only the child's view, but also the grown Roth's understanding of wartime events. The result is a book about family, about Jewish American life, about the vagaries of American politics, and an unsettling examination of what Roth calls the "sheer derangement" that can threaten a "nation's sanity."

Coetzee's lengthy and troubling review raises the question of whether Roth's novel is a roman a clef, a dark satire of the impact of President George W. Bush's governance on American life. Notably, Roth has spoken of moving back to New York City after Sept. 11 and witnessing a ratcheting up of the level of anxiety, patriotism, and political rhetoric in the wake of that disaster.

One also can't ignore the fact that with The Plot Against America, Roth has his first true bestseller in many years, a development that suggests a recognition among readers that the novel is relevant in some dramatic way.

But Jewish readers will recognize in the novel a story that is reflective of very particular and familiar Jewish concerns: the response of Western powers to Nazi violence; the willingness of societies to choose fascism; the proclivity in democratic states to make use of race in order to garner political points; and the risk that such demagoguery can spill over into outright pogroms.

Roth, like Mordecai Richler in Canada, has been criticized in the course of his career for his portrayal of the mainstream Jewish community. But with The Plot Against America (as with many of his books) he proves himself to be a savvy and funny, if idiosyncratic, examiner of tribal concerns. His relevance far outstrips that of the late work of Saul Bellow (or Richler for that matter). One wonders what has kept the Nobel committee from his door.

The Plot Against America, with its quirky rewrite of major 20th-century events, is one of Roth's stranger books. But it reaffirms the quality of his voice, the breadth of his reach, and the particular pleasure that comes from his fictional audacity.

Norman Ravvin's recent novel is Lola by Night and he is the co-editor of The Canadian Jewish Studies Reader. He chairs the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Former ballerina much sought after director

"I have to say to have the blessing to be both a performer and now being able to be a director, I think I've got the best of both worlds. I am one of the luckiest people," adds Holmes.

Originally from Texas, Holmes moved to Toronto with her Canadian filmmaker husband Tim Southam, last year.

Prior to enrolling at the prestigious National Theatre School in Montreal Holmes was a soloist with San Francisco Ballet, Dutch National Ballet and the Frankfurt Ballet. After graduating from theatre school in 1996, Holmes along with fellow students actors Severn Thompson and Bhaneja formed a creative collective called The Storm Collective; their debut theatre piece was called Standing Female Nude.

Song expresses 'the message I wanted to leave,' says woman with Alzheimer's

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

York University student Matthew Tishler, 18, recently collaborated with two of his fellow musicians to produce a haunting song, One More Memory, which was launched in September on World Alzheimer's Day at an Alzheimer Society convention in St. Thomas, Ont.

"I believe that One More Memory can touch the hearts and make a difference in people's lives," says Tishler, who plays guitar and piano and is a composer and music producer. "And now, other chapters of the Alzheimer Society are coming to us to get the music for their communities."

Mathew Tishler

While performing at a charity benefit concert in August 2003, Tishler met fellow songwriter and musician Andrew Ang and singer-songwriter Sara Westbrook through their music teacher, Tom Oliver. The three worked together to produce One More Memory. Westbrook is the vocalist on the CD.

Sara's mother Linda Westbrook, who works with Alzheimer patients in St. Thomas, had spoken to her daughter about a patient, Brenda Hounam, who was diagnosed with Alzheimer's four years ago.

"Brenda said she knew what was happening to her and was worried about her children and family," says Tishler. "She wanted to leave them a message to tell them she loved them, regardless of how the disease affected her mind or actions. She wanted them to remember her love for them but couldn't write down the words so that they would remember."

After Linda spoke to her daughter, Sara met with Hounam and called Tishler and Ang to help her co-write a song.

"We believe this is the first song about dementia or Alzheimer's written from the perspective of the victim," says Tishler of One More Memory, which begins with the words, "I was lost,/ In the dark,/ Confused and afraid,/ Not knowing what was wrong."

"When we played the song for Brenda, she was crying," Tishler says. "She told us that it was exactly what she wanted to say, the message she wanted to leave, and she said she wanted others to hear it."

In 2003, Tishler and Ang formed Laundromat Music, a songwriting company that writes music mainly for up-and-coming artists. Tishler and Ang often co-write the music with the artists.

Tishler says he has been surrounded by music all his life. His father, Jeff, was a music teacher and is now a school principal, "and my mother Jo-Ellen always loved music." His sister Nicole, 15, is a vocalist who has performed publicly since she was very young.

As a child, Tishler took music lessons, piano, voice, bass guitar, percussion, acting and dancing, and he appeared in talent shows, which, he says, "gave me the confidence to do community theatre and direct musicals."

He is studying in York University's Fine Arts Department, majoring in music composition.

He credits his grandmothers, Sheila Tishler and Shirley Green, for encouraging him to compose music.

"They wrote poems and lyrics and I wrote the music for them – that was the beginning. Sheila wrote poems about her mother Fanny, who had Alzheimer's, and it was my first assignment. I set her poem to music."

He then formed a band and composed music for the band. "We played many charity events."

When he and Ang formed Laundromat Music, he says, "we chose the name because it was in the basement of our house next to the laundry room and we could hear the machines."

The company now has a website www.laundromatmusic.com.

To hear or buy a copy of One More Memory, to hear Brenda Hounam answer questions on Alzheimer's, or to read the lyrics and see the full story of the making of the song, visit www.onemorememory.com.

Illustrated book revisits a bygone Toronto

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Toronto was a a work in progress from the end of World War I to the outbreak of World War II.

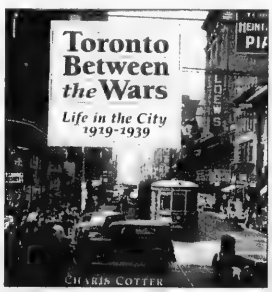
The pace of the city quickened as electricity was introduced and transportation systems were amalgamated.

Cars replaced horse-drawn carriages. Landmark buildings, among them Union Station and Maple Leaf Gardens, were built.

Attitudes to women began changing.

But back then, when 85 per cent of Torontonians were of British ancestry and the remaining 15 per cent was split among Jews (the largest minority), Italians, French, Finns, Greeks, Macedonians, Chinese, Japanese and blacks, racial discrimination was accepted in stride by most Canadians.

The prejudice was such that Jews were banned from many professions and some hotels.



The Toronto of old is the subject of Charis Cotter's Toronto Between the Wars: Life in the City 1919-1939, published by Firefly Books.

A handsome coffee-table volume brimming with intriguing and nostalgic photographs, it presents a multi-faceted picture of how Torontonians lived and worked during that period.

There is a kinetic photograph of the corner of Queen and Yonge, circa 1938, bustling with pedestrians and congested with cars and a streetcar.

Yet another photograph, from 1926, records the opening day at the Woodbine Race Track.

A third, from 1936, shows a May Day crowd.

As they scan the pages, Jewish readers will be reminded that, before 1920, the majority of Jewish immigrants lived in the Ward, the infamous neighbourhood straddling University Avenue and Queen, College and Yonge streets.

As Jews advanced, they started moving into better areas of town, notably around Kensington Market.

A couple of sharply observed photographs in the book distill the essence of their flight northward: in one, a woman in a coat, returning from the bustling market, cradles a live hen in her arms; in another, an elderly man with a black hat and a graying beard loads a baby carriage with goods.

The text is informative and concise. Cotter, a writer and editor raised in Cabbagetown, has a knack for focusing on important issues.

Toronto Between the Wars is an imperishable look at a bygone period that some of us won't miss.

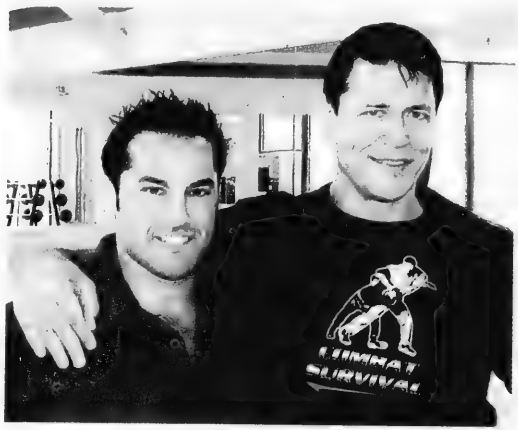
Aizik reintroduces Israeli combat techniques at sports club

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There must be something about the Canadian lifestyle that Moni Aizik just can't resist.

Maybe it's the long winters that force people indoors for a workout. Perhaps it's the pampered and cushy lifestyle that leaves people craving a taskmaster's tough hand to whip them into shape.

Whatever the reason, Aizik wasted no time on his return from his native Israel before teaming up with his former student, Joel Gerson, to open Edge Combat Fitness, a martial arts school in Concord, Ont., not far from the intersection of Highway 400 and Langstaff Road.



For the two, it's a bit of reprise of Aizik's successful earlier martial arts venture, the Samurai Club, a business he sold in 1999 prior to returning to Israel. After close to four years in his homeland, Aizik has returned to Toronto ready to introduce a new generation of Canadians to the hard-won satisfactions of Israeli combat training, survival training and the martial arts – including kung fu, karate, tae kwon do, jujitsu, tae bo and X-Treme martial arts.

Edge even offers classes for kids that gets youngsters in shape while teaching them fighting techniques, self-discipline and confidence.

Since it opened for business on Sept. 1, the club has been nearly fully subscribed, with Aizik's reputation in the martial arts community giving it a steady stream of students.

The Israeli aspect to the combat survival training has proven particularly appealing to a wide range of students and serves as "the core of the club," he said.

That technique of "fighting to survive," developed by the Israeli Defence Forces (IDF), is readily applicable to real-life situations, with students wearing street clothes to simulate the true-to-life aspect of the training, he said.

Aizik, who served in an IDF commando unit during the Yom Kippur War in 1973, later went on to develop and improve the hand-to-hand techniques of "krav maga" that are still employed in Israeli combat units.

He introduced those techniques on a commercial basis in Toronto and believes they became popular because effective self-defence techniques can be learned fairly quickly. In addition, the reputation of the IDF as a fighting force helped attract students, as did the fact you don't have to devote years to an esoteric eastern discipline to be able to defend yourself properly, he said.

The combat training program is the distillation of many techniques and methods culled from a variety of martial arts. There's some judo in it, as well as jujitsu and no-holds-barred fight techniques.

"The army tested hand-to-hand combat at close range and it can be implemented in day-to-day life in the street," Aizik said.

During his last sojourn in Israel, which lasted from 2000 to 2003, he trained members of Sayeret Matkal, the IDF's elite commando unit, and Yamam, a civilian counter-terror unit, in the techniques.

During his absence, Gerson continued to train fighters at the Samurai Club, and in 1998 he brought his competitive, championship-level fight career to an end. A Canadian jujitsu champion and North American Fearless Fighting Champion, he also developed quite a reputation in Japan, where he became the first person to defeat Rumina Sato, a local champion of the mixed martial art Shooto.

Gerson said Edge offers classes that split their emphasis between conditioning and technique. Regardless of the discipline they choose, Gerson said that to really benefit from the classes, students should be prepared to devote at least three days a week to the workouts.

Aizik said the club differs from traditional sports clubs in that classes are always stimulating and rarely repetitive, while Gerson notes that the intensity and focus of the workouts means "you completely leave all the problems of the day behind."

Win leaves Israel tied atop World Cup qualifying group

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NICOSIA — Israel earned a scrappy 2-1 victory over Cyprus last week on a wet night on the Mediterranean island to join Ireland and France with eight points at the top of their World Cup qualifying group.

A late goal by Avi Nimni sealed a first win for Israel in Nicosia. The previous Group Four match in Tel Aviv between the two sides also ended in a 2-1 win for the Israelis in September.

Israel had goalkeeper Nir Davidovich to thank after he made a brilliant save in the 75th minute to keep out a Michael Constantinou penalty kick awarded after Nimni fouled Marios Ilia.

The match began well for the visitors and the evenly contested first half saw Israel take the lead in the 16th minute through Adoram Keisi. Yiannakis Okkas got the equalizer for Cyprus in the 45th minute.

Ireland, France and Israel all have eight points after four matches, followed by Switzerland with five points from three. Cyprus has one point from five games and the Faroe Islands one from four.

Israel still has six games to go in the World Cup qualifying tournament, including a match against group favourite France. The top team in each of the eight groups automatically qualifies for the tournament, while second-place finishers head to a playoff round.

"I am pinching myself," said Israel coach Avraham Grant. "I cannot believe we have eight points. Nobody gave us much of a chance, but we proved we have the determination and the ability to keep up with the teams in the group."

"I don't know what happened. We did everything needed to win but we didn't have the luck. Or perhaps it was psychological. I just don't know," said Cyprus coach Momcilo Vukotic.

Israel took the lead in the 16th minute when defender Keisi was on hand to pounce on the rebound of a Nimni free kick which Cyprus goalkeeper Nikos Panagiotou failed to collect.

Okkas put the home team back on even terms in the final minute of the half when he was on hand to blast the ball into the roof of the net from close range after a mix-up in the Israeli defense.

A ragged second half played in pouring rain came to life in the 76th minute when Davidovich brilliantly saved Constantinou's penalty by stretching fully to his right to parry the ball away.

Cyprus keeper Panagiotou also had his moment when he rose high to palm a long-range shot by Israel's Yossi Benayoun over the bar, but the killer blow came when Benayoun weaved his way into the area and crossed for Nimni to seal the victory.

שנה אחת: יומן אישי. מאת: רעיה הרניק

עצוב לה. סדר פסח הופך קשה יותר ויותר. היא עייפה. מהעמדת פנים בחיק המשפחה. בעלה מאיר נפטר וקשה לה לנשום בלי גוני.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman, C.A.

One of the primary features of modern corporations is the separation of ownership and management functions. While shareholders cannot escape moral responsibility for untoward acts carried out under their direction, neither can the management team escape legal culpability for their actions.

Jewish law understands that the CEO of a publicly traded corporation has a fiduciary duty to maximize profits for the shareholders. He or she is the agent of the shareholders, whose main interest in owning stock is making money. Acting beyond this narrow perspective would be a violation of management duties, unless explicit shareholder approval is granted for an expanded social role. Being a good citizen is a responsibility of each and every shareholder, but it is not the mandate of the corporate entity itself.

In many ways, Jewish ethics echoes economist Milton Friedman's famous comment that the business of business is business. While it a wonderful mitzvah to give millions to charity, one must do so with one's own funds, not with shareholders' money. Even a majority of shareholders may not be able to force its philanthropic ideals on an unwilling minority, as this non-business activity violates a corporation's raison d'etre and is, therefore, unacceptable behaviour, notwithstanding majority approval. Similarly, a CEO would be enjoined from listening to a board directive to pay bills late or pay substandard wages. Such behaviour violates Jewish law and cannot be implemented even if "approved" by the corporate owners.

Yet, under the assumption that small charitable giving is the norm in the corporate sector, it would appear that following the industry-wide practice would be deemed acceptable. As well, a company may, if it chooses, incorporate itself on the premise that it donates a large portion of its profits to charity, provided full disclosure is provided.

Of course, in today's business environment, much corporate "giving" is in reality sophisticated, targeted advertising. It thus falls under management purview and presents no moral issues about acting beyond one's mandate, even if the amounts are substantial.

Thus, a health care company that "donates" millions to a hospital, or a computer company that donates thousands of computers to a local school board, should present no problem. The public relations motive not only does not detract from the mitzvah done, but from a corporate perspective, it actually legitimatizes it.

Of knishes, kolbos and kehilla

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I once wrote a story called Goat's Tails and Cows Feets. The protagonist was a curious man who craved "to know the world." He would walk near his home, watch as people hurriedly drove by and consider that he would likely never meet most of them, and that their lives would remain completely separate.

The essence of the story was that we are generally confined to a small area of the world, and throughout our lives we will have limited relationships with its inhabitants.

I have always been intrigued by this thought – that the world is composed of millions of neighbourhoods, like the Toronto Jewish community, and the sum total of our experiences is gleaned from modest worlds and few people.

We call these few very significant people "friends" or "community members." They travel within the same common boundaries as we do and draw upon similar resources required for day-to-day living. In our case, only members of the Toronto Jewish community can fully appreciate them. We can because Toronto's Jewish community is our mutual address. It is our home.

As an example, as members of the Toronto Jewish community, we have travelled its main thoroughfare – Bathurst Street – and witnessed the hubbub of pre-Shabbat activity. We know well the sight of Jews of all denominations carrying bouquets of flowers, challahs and bags of groceries.

If we were to meet another member of our community, say in Paris, and play Toronto Jewish geography, names such as Holy Blossom, Beth Tzedek and Shaarei Tefillah would be shared.

We would laugh as we discussed our mutual culinary experiences, such as the liver steak at Marky's deli, the rice pudding at United Bakers or the rum balls at Hermes Bakery.

As the game became more sophisticated, we might comment on the Beaches Shul, Mississauga's Solel Congregation or the Junction Shul, the little-known, aesthetically spiritual masterpiece near Dundas Street and Bloor Street West.

Indeed, as members of this particular club, the Toronto Jewish community, we frequently see the same people and feel a certain familiarity with the community's stores and institutions, their workers and even their signage.

Do you remember the sign that used to be on the front of Eitz Chaim Schools on Viewmount Avenue? "Where are you going. Eitz Chaim Schools Of Course." Do you recall the knishes we received as culinary gifts from the generous hands of Rabbi Stroli (may he rest in peace) and Mr. Pilc at the now-defunct Stroli's kosher market? Eating those knishes was, in some fascinating way, a right of passage in our community.

Life is challenging, in many ways, because we are ultimately alone. Yet we struggle to sidestep that existential solitude by creating and joining a "community."

To be part of it, and to grow into it, means knowing about the shvitz at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and its weekly kiddush club, with kosher gourmet offerings such as schnapps and herring. It means going to the Kolbo grocery store, the Negev Bookstore, Market Fresh fruits and vegetables, Temple Emanu-El, Kosher City, Baycrest and the Sephardic Kehilla Centre.

These are our landmarks. These are our people. They belong to our shared consciousness and experience, and most of them will stay with us throughout our lives like a Norman Rockwell picture. They are the backdrops for our existence on this earth.

We were born into the same place at the same time in history and therefore share something very particular: our community. Let us therefore celebrate it and keep its proverbial roadways clean and handsome.

Oh, by the way, name the pizza place at Cedarcroft and Bathurst…

New approach to Israel advocacy

CIC emphasizes democratic commonalities

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Pro-Israel advocates are being advised to stress the positive aspects of Israel and Israeli society, avoid blaming the Palestinians for the conflict, stress the similarities between Canada and Israel and personalize their message in a way that will appeal to a cross-section of Canadian society.

"Many of the time-tested approaches used by the Jewish community to communicate with Canadians are not working," stated a summary of poll results conducted for the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC). "We need a new approach if we want things to change," states the document Shared Values, Communicating to Canadians: Building Support for Israel.

The document has been distributed to community advocates who also participated in a 4½-hour training seminar to familiarize themselves with the most effective way of making Israel's case to the Canadian public, said Shimon Fogel, the CIC's chief executive officer.

To counter public misapprehensions about the Mideast situation, the guide suggests proponents of Israel develop a consistent message to share with the media, focus on the personal effects of violence on Israeli families, and remind government officials that Israel is committed to peace and would rather build the country through social programs than spend the money fighting terrorism.

The fundamental point of convincing Canadians to care about Israel "draws on the most basic of communication principles – finding a personal link to your audience – something that will trigger support and give Canadians a reason to care," the guide states.

Fogel said poll results and focus group studies suggest that stressing the values shared by Canada and Israel is the most effective way of promoting perceptions of Israel among average Canadians.

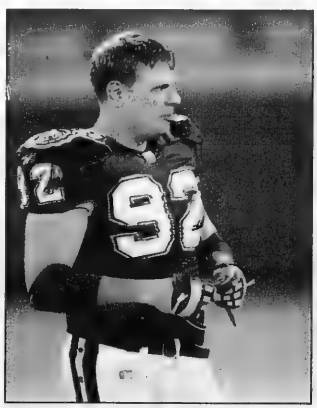
Argos savour Grey Cup

Veteran hails new owners, 'family' atmosphere



Noah Cantor

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Sipping bubbly liquid refreshment out of the Grey Cup is becoming a familiar end-of-season ritual for Noah Cantor.

Just over a week ago, the veteran defensive tackle for the Toronto Argonauts enjoyed the drink of champions for the fourth time in his career when the Argos defeated the heavily favoured B.C. Lions 27-19 in Ottawa. Twice before while an Argo – in 1996 and 1997 – he was on a Cup-winning team, and in 2000 he won his third Grey Cup as a B.C. Lion.

This one, Cantor said, was particularly satisfying, not only because it was "fresh" in his mind but because he considers the current edition of the Argos a really tight-knit group of guys who enjoy each other's company.

All the talk about the Argo "family" is right on target, he said. The atmosphere on the club is fantastic, especially for Cantor and his defensive linemates. "As a defense we really stuck together. We did more things as a team than I'd ever done before."

David Cynamon

Howard Sokolowski

The team was buoyed all year by the stability created by new owners, businessmen David Cynamon and Howard Sokolowski.

"They showed to the team and to the city they were committed to succeed," Cantor said

All through the regular season, the Argos were considered a good team, but perhaps not quite in the league of the division leaders, the Montreal Alouettes and the B.C. Lions. Beating both teams en route to being crowned Grey Cup champions certainly dispelled any lingering doubts about the squad, which was hamstrung all season by serious injuries to key players.

News in Brief

CANADA

School Accredited

WINNIPEG — The Gray Academy of Jewish Education was accredited by the Canadian Association for Independent Schools (CAIS) at the group's recent annual meeting in Montreal. The Winnipeg school, which has 668 students in junior kindergarten through high school, is the first Jewish school to join CAIS. Established in 1979, CAIS has 75 members, including Toronto's Upper Canada College and Montreal's Lower Canada College. Members are focused on preparing students for post-secondary education and must meet high employment and admissions standards.

Writing Contest

TORONTO — Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish and Humanitarian Relief Committee is accepting submissions for its fifth annual creative writing contest for Toronto's homeless. Last year, it received more than 100 entries, the most yet, and this year it hopes to receive more than 150. Winners get cash prizes, donated by local businesses, ranging from $75 to $1,000 and will have their work published in a booklet to be distributed by Ve'ahavta. For details, call 416-964-7698. Contest deadline is Dec. 3.

WORLD

Hate Ruled Out

ANTWERP —The early-morning killing of a haredi man in Antwerp Nov. 18 appears to be linked to debt collection and not anti-Semitism, Jewish leaders said last week. The Co-ordinating Committee of Antwerp Jewish Communities and the Forum of Antwerp Jewish Organizations said police are pursuing a criminal angle in the case. Moshe Na'eh, 25, a sexton for a chassidic group, was shot in the diamond district while on his way home from shul.

Swap Denounced

TEL AVIV — Jonathan Pollard, the ex-U.S. Navy analyst serving a life sentence in a U.S. jail for sharing classified data with Israel, said he is against a rumoured deal to free him in exchange for Israel's release of Palestinian militia leader Marwan Barghouti. In a letter to supporters, Pollard was responding to word Israel may release Barghouti, in jail for murder, in exchange for himself and an accused Israeli spy in an Egyptian jail in order to boost the Palestinian leadership after PA president Yasser Arafat's death.

Coalition Praises PM's Efforts in Sudan

TORONTO — A Canadian humanitarian group praised Paul Martin for meeting with Sudanese officials during his trip to Africa last week to discuss the crisis in Darfur.

Canadians for Action on Darfur – a coalition of 48 faith-based, humanitarian, and human rights groups, including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress, and Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish and Humanitarian Relief Committee – had urged the prime minister to press the Sudanese government to comply with all UN Security Council resolutions, to halt militia attacks against civilians and "to swiftly reach a just peace for the people of Darfur."

The group wanted Martin to secure a timetable for the disarmament of government-backed Janjaweed militias and a deal for an enlarged peacekeeping mission from the African Union. But President Omar Hassan Ahmad al Bashir told Martin that he has no control over the militias, a claim Martin said he didn't accept, Canadian Press reported.

"Canada has been playing a most helpful role in its efforts to end the ethnic cleansing in Darfur and Canadians for Action on Darfur looks forward to even more forceful Canadian involvement," said Simon Rosenblum, director of public policy and Israel affairs for CJC and co-chair of the coalition.

"The people of Darfur need concrete steps toward securing the region so the millions of displaced persons… can begin voluntarily returning home," said John Lewis, co-chair of the coalition and a member of KAIROS, the justice wing of the Canadian Council of Churches.

Appeal Denied

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. Supreme Court has declined an appeal from John Demjanjuk to restore his U.S. citizenship. A judge stripped the Ukrainian-born Cleveland man of his citizenship in 2002, ruling he lied and hid his past as a Nazi concentration camp guard to gain citizenship. Demjanjuk, 84, won't face deportation until all his appeals are exhausted. At least one is still before the courts. Demjanjuk was acquitted in Israel in 1993 of being "Ivan the Terrible," but has been unable to refute evidence he was a Nazi guard.

Nazi Rally Protested

BERLIN — Germany's Jewish community is urging politicians not to ignore plans by neo-Nazis to mark the 60th anniversary of the end of World War II. Right-wing extremists say they will rally May 8 at Berlin's Brandenburg Gate "against 60 years of liberation lies" and for an "end to the cult of guilt." The landmark is steps away from the new Holocaust memorial, which is to be dedicated at that time.

CHANUKAH GREETINGS FROM STONECRAFT MONUMENT FACTORY

A Chanukah Reminder from

Steeles Memorial Chapel

For many of us, Chanukah is a time to recall memories of time spent with family and loved ones.

Unfortunately, some seniors are left with only that ... memories.

If there's an elderly person whom you care for, visit, and light a candle with them. Make sure they're in good health, eating nutritionally and taking medication as prescribed.

It's amazing how a little love and caring can make such a big difference.

CRTC approves national Jewish TV channel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

If all goes according to plan, Canadians will soon be able to view a first: a national television channel that will broadcast Jewish programming around the clock.

The Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CTRC) approved a broadcasting licence for a national Jewish TV service late last month.

Dubbed JTV – Jewish Television – the service is "directed particularly towards young Jewish Canadians [and would] offer programming that reflects the Jewish religion and lifestyle," the CRTC said in a statement announcing its decision.

JTV was granted a Category 2 licence, meaning it will be distributed only on the digital tier of channels. As well, the licensee, Toronto-based MediaNet Canada Ltd., must persuade cable companies and satellite services to carry the service.

MediaNet Canada owns and operates several FM radio stations that broadcast in German, Sinhalese and Tamil. It also owns Tamil TV, available in Toronto on Rogers' channel 618.

It has also been granted licences for a Russian-language television service, as well as channels that will offer movies, news and movies.

The conditions of licence for JTV are as follows: not less than 55 per cent of all programming will be in Yiddish and Hebrew; not more than 20 per cent in English; not more than 10 per cent in French; and not less than five per cent in Arabic, Russian and German.

At least 15 per cent of all programming must be Canadian content, although the people behind the service are hoping it will exceed that.

"We're hoping to get interest from Jewish organizations and community members," says Phillip Koneswaran, vice-president of business development at MediaNet.

Koneswaran, whose family has operated Tamil-language media outlets in Sri Lanka and Germany, said some shareholders in MediaNet are Jewish, "and were looking to expand."

In the meantime, "we're looking for acquisitions and preparing for distribution." The company, he said, will search for qualified individuals in the Jewish community to serve as program directors.

In order to satisfy the Hebrew requirement, Koneswaran said the channel will broadcast news, analysis, documentaries and public affairs programs from Israel.

The channel also plans to offer programming in religion, drama, comedy, professional and amateur sports, music, human interest and public service announcements.

"The aim is not so much political as cultural," Koneswaran said.

In its licence application, filed last year, MediaNet said the service "will be directed towards the Jewish community market in Canada only." As well, English and French content will be "directed towards Jewish Canadians, especially towards young Jewish Canadians, to enhance the Jewish religion as well as lifestyle in a broader sense."

The next step – convincing cable companies to carry the channel – is the hardest part, Koneswaran said.

"Progress has been very slow. This is the part where we're looking for help." He said Rogers and Bell ExpressVu have been approached, but both are a long way from making a decision.

"Since there's nothing similar, they should be looking at it seriously," Koneswaran said. "When it comes to specialty channels for ethnic groups, most carriers have a limited understanding."

So far, he said, Rogers has shown the most interest.

But approval in one market doesn't necessarily mean a carrier in another part of the country will agree to offer the service, he added.

The goal, Koneswaran noted, is a cross-Canada, 24-hour-a-day Jewish channel.

"There's a very good market for it."

The CRTC's granting of a licence to JTV came at the same time that it approved the addition of Fox News to its list of eligible services for digital distribution.

The commission sided with 531 supporters, including B'nai Brith Canada, who wanted the U.S. channel, which is known for its staunchly conservative views.

Heroic social entrepreneur

From the editor's desk

David Bornstein is not so young as to be a wild-eyed, naive, gee-whiz optimist, but nor is he so old as to be cynical, suspicious and derisive of the desire in fellow human beings to do good for others. He is in his early 40s.

Most people who have travelled the world as much as he has, especially the developing and Third World countries, might long ago have given up on the notion that individuals can make a positive difference in the lives of others. But not David Bornstein.

Bornstein is the author of the recently published book How to Change the World: Social Entrepreneurs and the Power of New Ideas, Oxford University Press, 2004.

"This is a book about people who solve problems on a large scale," Bornstein writes. "They are not politicians or industrialists. Some are doctors, lawyers and engineers. Others are management consultants, social workers, teachers and journalists. They are scattered far and wide… What unites them is their role as social innovators, or social entrepreneurs. They have powerful ideas to improve people's lives and they have implemented them across cities, countries and, in some cases, the world.

"The purpose of the book is not to exalt a few men or women, but to call attention to the role of a particular type of actor who propels social change [the social entrepreneur]."

Bornstein defines the term social entrepreneurs quite specifically. They are "transformative forces: people with new ideas to address major problems, who are relentless in the pursuit of their visions, people who simply will not take 'no' for an answer, who will not give up until they have spread their ideas as far as they possibly can."

After a recent telephone conversation with him, I couldn't help but believe that Bornstein himself was a social entrepreneur, a transformative force for good, no less than any of the nine present-day individuals whose stories he has chronicled in How to Change the World.

He was born and grew up in Montreal. After receiving a degree from McGill University in management studies, he travelled for a year. He was 23 years old. And it was the mid-1980s.

As he told me quietly in his unpretentious way, he then saw the world in a way he hadn't before. "It led to questioning the values and the framework" of his own life.

In a sense, as he explained, he saw newer meaning in the words and lessons of his teachers from religious school who, he said, had taught him: "Save a life and you save an entire world."

It was then that Bornstein decided to become a writer. Thus, as many young aspiring writers and artists have done, he moved to New York City and studied journalism at New York University.

David Bornstein

After graduation from journalism, Bornstein freelanced for many publications, eking out his living in the tradition of all young journalists.

One day, he read an article about the Grameen Bank in Bangladesh, a bank that lent money to conventionally high-risk borrowers – women and other poor people. Intrigued, he travelled to Bangladesh in 1991 to investigate. It was a lead on a potentially great story. He spent four months there and the visit inspired him to write a book. It took five years to write The Price of a Dream: The Story of the Grameen Bank. It won second prize in the Harry Chapin Media Awards and was selected as a finalist for the New York Public Library Book Award for Excellence in Journalism.

Bornstein's life mission seemed to crystallize. For it was from writing the book, as he told me, "that he learned the power of a person who has a deep, deep determination to make changes."

Around the time of his marriage in 1999, Bornstein began the exhausting research for his second book, the work that would become How to Change the World.

Bornstein lives in New York City with his wife, Abigail, and his son, Elijah. But he still sees himself as a Montrealer. Indeed his parents, brother and sister still live there.

And the idea he is propagating – the power of an individual to change the world – is starting slowly to stir souls and shake some of the comfortable, conventional thinking in boardrooms. Bornstein has already had some 75 speaking engagements at major universities, business networks and foundations. And in February he will be the keynote speaker at Ernst and Young's world summit in Singapore, along with Henry Kissinger.

"Judaism's approach [to our human responsibilities]," Bornstein said, "is very realistic because it involves more of a personal struggle. We always start with actions. God created the world for us to use and we have to deal with things in this realm.

"There are people all over the world who can do things to assist others. It all begins with the belief: I can be an agent for change. And it's worth it because the world is a good place."

The approach of Chanukah is a fitting occasion to reflect on David Bornstein's unique commitment to trying to make a difference in the lives of others. He is not a sword-wielding fighter in the mould of the Maccabees. But he certainly is an idealist, as they were. The Maccabees fought to change the world. So, too, does David Bornstein. —MBD

Israeli Nobel Prize winner Aaron Ciechanover emerges from adversity

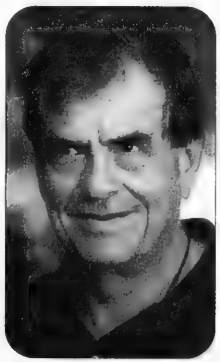
By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences selected Aaron Ciechanover as this year's co-recipient of the Nobel Prize in chemistry, he was praised as the co-discoverer of the ubiquitin system, which governs the degradation and death of cells in the body.

But the human drama of his life as an orphan growing up in the Israeli port city of Haifa under his aunt's and brother's care and supervision was omitted.

So was the fact that he and his brother, Joseph (Yossi), have carved out spectacular careers for themselves, despite the untimely deaths of their parents within a six-year period.

Ciechanover, 57, studied medicine at Hebrew University, was a post-doctoral fellow in the United States and is now a professor of biochemistry at the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology.



Aaron Ciechanover

His brother, a lawyer by profession, was director-general of Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs under Moshe Dayan and served as chair of the Israel Discount Bank in New York. Today, he chairs El Al Israel Airlines' board of directors and is president of the Challenger Fund, a private equity management company.

Raised in Haifa's blue-collar Hadar Hacarmel district, Ciechanover was only 10 when his mother died and 16 when his father passed away. His parents were Polish Jews who immigrated to Israel long before Israeli statehood.

Ciechanover – who shares the 2004 Nobel Prize with two colleagues, Israeli Avram Hershko and American Irwin Rose – was brought up by a loving aunt, Miriam Vishniac.

"She took me in," he recalled in an interview from his lab at the Technion. "She gave me a feeling of a home."

Later, Ciechanover was nurtured by his brother and his wife, Atara.

He said he is forever grateful that they were there for him during that void in his childhood.

Scheduled to accept his prestigious award at a ceremony in Stockholm on Dec. 10., Ciechanover found out that he had won the Nobel Prize when the secretary of the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences called him on the eve of Simchat Torah.

He was just leaving his house to do some last-minute shopping when his son, Isaac, a student of social work at Haifa University, told him of a phone call.

"It was a big surprise, a real big surprise," said Ciechanover, whose wife Menuca is a physician and director of geriatrics at Haifa's Carmel Hospital.

"I certainly didn't expect to win in chemistry," he added. "Maybe medicine."

Working with Rose, a University of California scientist, Ciechanover and Hershko – Ciechanover's former mentor at the Technion – discovered a process that enables cells to destroy unwanted proteins.

If proteins are not degraded when they should be, the cell continues to divide, causing cancer.

Ciechanover and Hershko knew they had hit paydirt when they pinpointed the ubiquin system.

Some of the major breakthroughs in their research – partly financed by the Israel Cancer Research Fund – occurred in Rose's lab.

On the basis of their research, the drug Velcade was developed. Targeting the ubiquitin system, it is used to treat multiple myeloma, a cancer of the bone marrow.

Approved by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration last year, Velcade inhibits cell growth and leads to remission in cancer patients.

Ciechanover said a Canadian scientist, Julian Adams, was a major figure in the development of Velcade.

Adams, who is Jewish, was born in Quebec City and educated at McGill University. His brother, Sylvan, said that Adams discovered Velcade when he was chief scientist at a Boston biotech startup called Proscript, which was acquired by Milllenium Pharmaceuticals. In 2002, the Multiple Myeloma Society in Los Angeles honoured him as the Man of the Year, and last year, he appeared on the cover of Forbes.

Ciechanover, whose friends call him Tzacha, hopes that his Nobel Prize will be of benefit to Israel.

"I'll try to use it for the best, to be a spokesman for Israeli science, to increase the funding of science in Israel."

Israeli science is on a high level. "It is excellent," he said.

But budgetary restraints have have a negative effect.

In the past few years, he has received job offers from abroad, but Ciechanover said he has no intention of leaving Haifa.

"I'll stay in Israel, where I was born and where I will die. Israel is my base and will be. People should live where they're comfortable."

In Stockholm, Ciechanover will receive a gold medal, a diploma and a cut of the $1.3-million (US) prize. Before that, he will deliver a scientific lecture.

Asked how he intends to use his share of the winnings, he replied, "I don't know. It's the least important matter."

Fallen soldier's mother brings special 'gift'

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When Cheryl Mandel's son was killed by a Palestinian terrorist in Nablus in 2003, she resolved to channel her pain into something positive.

"The enemy got a victory when they killed Daniel," Mandel told an audience gathered at Beth Tzedec Congregation recently.

"If I go down too, they then get another victory…So we're going to use the pain to fuel ourselves to do something good."

Speaking about the challenges of living in a war zone and losing a child, Mandel paid tribute to her son's life and encouraged support for a memorial book and Beit Midrash in his memory.

Her talk, which included a video of Daniel's life, was part of a larger effort to inspire North Americans to appreciate the commitment made by Israeli soldiers like Daniel and to provide comfort to others who have lost loved ones during the Intifadah.

Born in Toronto, Daniel made aliyah with his family in 1987 at the age of eight.

A staunch Zionist and skilled soldier, Daniel quickly advanced in the Israel Defence Forces, becoming a platoon commander of an elite combat unit.

Daniel Mandel

As a leader of many soldiers, Daniel gained a reputation as a demanding, but caring commander.

"Daniel was truly valiant," said his uncle, Lionel. "He had the courage of a lion and the soul of a poet."

In April 2003, while confronting three Palestinian terrorists held up in a student housing facility in Nablus, Daniel was fatally shot.

The reverence fellow soldiers felt for their fallen commander was best evidenced the moment he was shot, as they risked their own lives by immediately running, in the midst of gunfire, to carry Daniel to safety.

Thousands of people attended his funeral.

"At the funeral, I explained that I always taught my children that…it's what you do when something bad happens that determines the type of person you are," Cheryl Mandel said.

"I've come to Toronto with a gift. That gift is Daniel, a real hero who is a source of inspiration."

Part of the inspiration Mandel hopes to engender is for North Americans to recognize the bravery and commitment of Israeli soldiers who serve in the IDF.

"Is there something in your children's life that matters enough to them that they are willing to die for?" she asked.

"For all Israeli soldiers, they believe (strongly) enough in a Jewish state that they are willing to die for it."

Mandel said a Beit Midrash in the village of Avigayil is being built in Daniel's memory and she emphasized her desire to build "a real Beit Knesset" for Daniel.

She drew a touching parallel between Daniel's experience and her own. When Daniel was training in the army and had to participate in an arduous trek, a fellow soldier who was carrying a machine gun fell ill. Daniel was called upon to pick up the slack, even though he had no previous experience carrying a heavy weapon on such a long journey.

"Daniel wasn't trained for this task, but he did it," Mandel said.

"I feel like I'm on a trek. I've been handed this burden that I'm not trained for, but I'm going to do it with as much dignity as I can muster."

Orthodox rabbis debate pros and cons of insularity

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Nathan Lopes Cardozo says the haredi community's unwillingness to speak to Conservative and Reform Jews is "a big mistake."

Not only does it give the impression of fearfulness, he believes, but he has found that he learns much from Reform and Conservative writings. Such critiques of the Orthodox perspective help him better formulate his own philosophy, he said at a recent symposium.

The Dutch-born dean of the David Cardozo Academy in Jerusalem – who says he has a foot in both the haredi and the modern Orthodox worlds – was joined by three colleagues in a panel discussion on "The Future of Judaism," moderated by educator Elliott Malamet at the third annual Torah in Motion conference, "Renewing Our Spirit – Self, Family, Nation," held at Beth Jacob V'Anshei Drildz Congregation Nov. 7.

Also participating on the panel were well-known modern Orthodox leader Rabbi Norman Lamm, chancellor of Yeshiva University and keynote speaker for the day; Rabbi Yosef Reinman, a haredi rabbi from Lakewood, N.J., who co-authored the controversial book One People, Two Worlds: A Reform Rabbi and an Orthodox Rabbi Explore the Issues That Divide Them; and Rabbi Pini Dunner, founding rabbi of London, England's Saatchi Synagogue, aimed at 25- to 45-year-olds.

> 'We have insulated ourselves so much that the non-Jewish world to a great extent no longer exists [for the haredi community]'

The day-long session attended by about 300 people – and the panel in particular – embodied one of Torah in Motion's underlying goals: not to be afraid to deal with controversial issues in an open manner, said Rabbi Jay Kelman, co-founder of the organization with his wife Ilana and with Malamet in 2002.

Kicking off a lively exchange, Malamet asked panellists whether halachic Judaism has become too insular.

Rabbi Reinman said that, with the publication of his book two years ago, he hoped he had exploded the myth about the inability of his community to "engage" other Jews. (The book notwithstanding, Rabbi Reinman cancelled a planned joint book tour following pressure from haredi leaders.)

However, he noted, "the haredi world does not feel it's important as part of the chinuch [education] of our children to expose them to everything in the world, because you're taking a very high risk."

Rabbi Dunner, whose family background is haredi, challenged Rabbi Reinman's contention that haredim are free to decide whether to explore the secular world as they get older.

Rabbi Dunner said Rabbi Reinman's statement was "ideologically" correct, but that "practically speaking" there are very strong barriers to engaging with the secular world, extending to acceptance as part of the community and ability to find a marriage partner.

Haredim are left at the mercy of the very people they want to avoid, by being "too cut off" from the modern world, Rabbi Lamm said. "The answer has to be nuanced."

Every community has to protect young children, he said. "[But] I refuse to make a virtue out of ignorance, and I think it's important that we do… train young people coming into an age of maturity [regarding] who they are… and let them know how to grapple with the world."

Rabbi Lopes Cardozo expressed similar sentiments, tempered by his agreement with Rabbi Reinman that North American haredi communities have more awareness of the outside world than their Israeli counterparts.

Another problem, according to Rabbi Lopes Cardozo, is the haredi "obsession with Halachah for the sake of Halachah."

He lamented an absence of haredi teaching of "the mission [of Judaism]," citing the notion of being a light unto the nations. "We have insulated ourselves so much that the non-Jewish world to a great extent no longer exists [for the haredi community]."

In his experience, many yeshiva students do not know how to answer a non-religious Jew who asks why they are religious.

At the same time, he said, in the modern Orthodox world, Halachah is not always taken seriously enough. "There's too much shopping going on, finding this rabbi for this heter [dispensation], that rabbi for that heter."

Also, he noted, too many people call themselves modern Orthodox but have no idea what it means. Modern Orthodox writings are read by a very small number of people, he said.

Regarding other denominations of Judaism, Rabbi Reinman said that to acknowledge his co-author as a rabbi would leave "the impression there are different streams of Judaism – different flavours of the same product – and it's not true."

Rabbi Lamm said that while he doesn't recognize Reform rabbis as legitimate (in relation to Jewish law), he does recognize them as "valid" in terms of being leaders of a strong Jewish movement.

Malamet challenged Rabbi Lamm as to whether he would appear on a panel with Jews for Jesus, because they are similarly "valid."

In response to his answer – "No way!" – Rabbi Reinman said the difference between them was "where you draw the red line."

"Some of your friends draw it closer, and keep me out too," quipped Rabbi Lamm.

In answer to Malamet's final question – "If you had unlimited resources, what would you do to revive Judaism?" – the rabbis had a variety of answers, including Rabbi Lamm's suggestion for a revamping of the Jewish education system, with free tuition from elementary school through graduate school, a doubling of teacher's salaries and firing about half the existing teachers.

Ignatieff criticizes Sharon's disengagement plan

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan to unilaterally disengage from the Gaza Strip and four West Bank settlements will make a two-state solution impossible, says Canadian scholar Michael Ignatieff.

In a recent speech at Holy Blossom Temple, Ignatieff, the director of the Carr Center for Human Rights Policy at Harvard University, said Sharon's yet-to-be-implemented plan would leave most West Bank settlements in Israel's hands and thus stifle the emergence of a viable, contiguous and demilitarized Palestinian state.

Michael Ignatieff

And such an entity is in Israel's long-range interests, he said.

Delivering the Nov. 20 Gerald Schwartz and Heather Reisman lecture, Ignatieff argued that Sharon's scheme would turn Palestinian areas in the West Bank into disconnected cantons, making real Palestinian statehood impossible.

Rather than protecting Israel, the plan would endanger Israel by creating a permanent terrorist haven in Gaza, a rallying cry for jihad recruiters and a source of constant terrorism, he said.

Ignatieff, the author of books ranging from Human Rights as Politics and Idolatry to The Warrior's Honour: Ethnic War and the Modern Conscience, warned that a Palestinian state lacking viability and contiguity would not guarantee Israel's security.

By contrast, a genuine two-state solution would ensure the preservation of Israeli democracy and meet Israel's security needs, he added.

Ignatieff, paraphrasing the late David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, said that Israel's "permanent occupation" of the territories would be morally and politically unsustainable.

He urged Sharon to adopt the "right political strategy" by withdrawing from the territories after mutually agreed upon border adjustments and land swaps.

"This is a hard swallow, but the lesser of evils."

A pullout from the West Bank and Gaza would relieve Israel of the responsibility of permanently occupying a hostile Palestinian population, Ignatieff said.

In a critique of U.S. President George W. Bush's Mideast policies, he said that the United States "can't have it both ways" – backing Sharon's plan while supporting a two-state solution.

Ignatieff predicted that Israel's alliance with the United States would come under sharper scrutiny should terrorists succeed in carrying out a second Sept. 11-type attack.

He paid tribute to the Israel Defence Forces, saying it was 'the toughest, most experienced' counter-terrorist force in the world

The United States might then try to impose a peace agreement on Israel and the Palestinians. Ignatieff advised Israel to defuse its conflict with the Palestinians before that happens.

In any case, the Palestinian issue should be resolved and "taken off the table."

Ignatieff also criticized the route, but not the concept, of a security fence separating Israel from the Palestinians. A barrier that cuts deeply into the West Bank is an unjustifiable "land grab."

And he said certain Israeli anti-terror tactics, from home demolitions to targeted assassinations, are counter-productive.

Nevertheless, Ignatieff paid tribute to the Israel Defence Forces, saying it was "the toughest, most experienced" counter-terrorist force in the world.

Congratulating Israeli civilians for their "civic courage" in the face of terrorist attacks, Ignatieff said their will has not been broken.

In a generic commentary on global terrorism, Ignatieff noted that while terrorists can't defeat Western democracies on the battlefield, they can crack their will and morale and force them to accede to their demands.

As examples, he cited the victory of Arab rebels over France in Algeria and the triumph of Jewish fighters over Britain in Mandate Palestine.

Terrorism, therefore, can succeed if used as a political weapon.

Addressing the current turmoil in Iraq, Ignatieff said that Iraqi rebels whose goal is to drive the United States and its allies out of Iraq are winning the insurgency. It will be "a long and difficult campaign," he said.

Counter-insurgency strategies must be consistent with democratic principles and leave an opening for negotiations, Ignatieff observed.

But he pointed out that the elimination of terrorism, within the context of total victory, is an unattainable objective.

Pinpointing a contradiction in American policy in the Middle East, Ignatieff said that while the Bush administration hails liberty and democracy, it aligns itself with authoritarian regimes in Egypt and Saudi Arabia.

Efrat resident seeks aid for self-defence units

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In the last year or so, the number of successful Palestinian bomb attacks has dropped considerably, though not from lack of trying.

Israeli security forces have been able to prevent 40 to 60 potential terrorist attacks every day, while in Yesha – the Hebrew acronym for Yehuda (Judea) and Shomron (Samaria) – communities continue to face one or two attempted infiltrations every day, according to Israel Danziger, a resident of the West Bank town of Efrat.

Fed up with living in the Palestinians' crosshairs and tired of relying on an overstretched Israeli Defence Forces to come to their aid in a timely fashion, the region's settlers have created Mishmeret Yesha, a self-defence organization that trains and equips residents who serve as a rapid response team (RRT) to fight off infiltrators, Danziger said.

Danziger was in Toronto and New York recently to raise Mishmeret Yesha's profile, raise funds and inform his audience of the type of defence equipment settlers need to keep their homes safe.

Danziger said Yesha residents deserve support regardless of one's political views

Michael Lebovic, the Canadian co-ordinator for Mishmeret Yesha, said the organization has found local support from people affiliated with the Toronto Zionist Council.

Mishmeret Yesha helps each settler community prepare for the nearly inevitable clashes with Palestinian terrorists, who target civilians on an almost hourly basis, Danziger said. Communities in Yesha have had to bear the brunt of the Palestinian war against Israel. While the most deadly attacks take place in Jerusalem and other major cities, 96 per cent of all incidents are aimed at residents of Yesha, he said.

When the infiltrations succeed, the results are usually deadly and particularly cruel, since children are often the attackers' main target. In one case, a mother and her two children were shot in their home at point-blank range as she read them a bedtime story. In another, Boaz Shabo returned to his home in Itamar to learn his wife and three of his children were killed after being seized by an infiltrator.

Mishmeret Yesha helps communities create their own local SWAT-like teams to fight off the attacks. The units consist of at least a dozen men – all combat veterans – who receive special training in urban warfare and counterterrorism tactics, he said.

Remarkably, neither their equipment nor the training is paid for by the Israeli government, a fact that many North American Jews find hard to fathom. The government simply doesn't have the resources to adequately outfit these volunteer units, let alone give them the specialized training they need, Danziger said.

A short, stocky man with a graying beard and a thinning hair topped with a knitted kippah, Danziger said donations from abroad are necessary to give these units the gear they need to respond quickly to attacks.

Among the items that are part of their kits are protective vests, bulletproof helmets equipped with special microphones and receivers, so defence teams can communicate with each other; night-fighting equipment; special scopes for their guns; assault lights; and other high-tech gadgetry that makes the teams lethally effective.

Since February 2002, more than 57 Yesha residents have been killed while going about their daily business. Seven schools were specifically singled out for attack, with an average of three to five youngsters killed at each one. One infiltrator even targeted a group of teenagers playing basketball, he said.

The RRTs, along with high-tech fences and 24-hour security monitoring, have combined to reduce the number of fatalities in Yesha. Since Passover 2003, there have been no successful infiltrations, with one or two notable exceptions, Danziger said.

A typical incident faced by the RRTs took place about three months ago when terrorists were spotted crossing a wadi outside Itamar, a Yesha community near Jenin. They attempted to shoot the first Israeli driver who crossed their path, but he escaped and contacted the community's security co-ordinator. The co-ordinator, in turn, alerted the local RRT. Although the co-ordinator was killed when he went to investigate the incident, RRT members pursued the infiltrators and killed one before he could enter the settlement.

The RRT's action prevented further carnage in Itamar, a community of 100 families in which 25 per cent of the children have lost at least one parent, Danziger said.

A few weeks ago at Yitzhar, a community of 80 families west of Highway 60, the West Bank's main north/south artery, an infiltrator entered the village and made a mad dash for one of the homes. It turned out it was the residence of a RRT member, who shot the terrorist before he could inflict any damage.

Danziger, a native of Brooklyn who moved to Israel 32 years ago, said equipping RRTs is expensive, $60,000 (US) for one 12-man unit. In addition, the 108-hour anti-terrorism course costs $13,500 (US) per team.

Danziger said Yesha residents deserve support regardless of one's political views. Their lives are at stake and they need to take care of their safety.

Asked if it wouldn't be simpler to evacuate the communities, as Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has proposed for Gaza, Danziger said the settlers don't believe Sharon will succeed in the evacuation. The settlers are confident they can convince the Israeli public to oppose the move, just as they convinced Likud Party members to vote against the proposed pullout.

Yesha and Gaza residents are living in those regions because "it is our right to be there. It's our country, our biblical right to be there. Jewish people have as much right to be there as anywhere in Israel," he said.

Furthermore, abandoning the settlements would not end the conflict. "It's a religious conflict. It's not about land. Muslims don't want Jews there, regardless of borders," he said.

Exporting our values

Prime Minister Paul Martin last week concluded his impressive 10-day trip abroad to Chile, Brazil, Sudan and Burkina Faso with a concise, refreshingly unambiguous statement concerning Canada's evolving foreign policy. He was speaking at a press conference at the meeting of La Francophonie in Ouagadougou, in Burkina Faso, in which he confirmed that Canada had agreed with La Francophonie and the European Union to help rebuild Haiti's battered justice system.

"We can either stay at home and watch the world pass us by, or we can take the lead… We have values that we should export as well as our goods. The two are important." (Our emphasis.)

Affirming the importance of Canadian values as a factor in the formulation of Canadian foreign policy is indeed a welcome statement by the prime minister and suggests, perhaps, an innovation in Ottawa's thinking. It suggests, perhaps a turning away from the reflexive reliance upon expedience as the pre-eminent determinant of what constitutes the Canadian foreign policy interest.

According to the prime minister's pronouncement, it will now be in Canadian interests that our foreign policy reflect and project Canadian values.

It may be that the prime minister had precisely this new formulation of foreign policy in mind even prior to his trip. Last month, he spoke with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and newly installed Palestine Liberation Organization head Mahmoud Abbas, the leading candidate to succeed the late Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat, offering to help monitor the upcoming Palestinian elections.

Any measures – such as Canadian election monitors – that foster the rooting of democratic structures into Palestinian soil are to be encouraged. That is why Alan Baker, Israel's ambassador in Ottawa, expressed his country's effusive support for Martin's offer.

"I see this as a very positive sign. We think that Canada can play a central role in helping push forward the peace process and helping encourage the Palestinians to build up their own good governance," he told The CJN.

The projection of our values in Canadian Middle East policy, though, should not be restricted to the upcoming Palestinian elections. There is also, for example, the matter of the egregious, perennial Israel-bashing at the United Nations. In his remarks to The CJN, Baker also expressed the hope that Canada might play "a more active role" in this arena as well.

The proof of Canada's faithfulness to Martin's seemingly revised foreign policy doctrine of exporting Canadian values will be found in the results. In the upcoming days, the nearly two dozen annual anti-Israel resolutions will come before the General Assembly. If Canadian values are truly factored into the equation, Canada's voting record this year concerning a fellow democracy, the only democracy in the Middle East, should be substantially different from that of preceding years.

Arafat's demise a footstep to peace

I applauded Israel's decision to not allow Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's body to be buried in Israel soil. Let Allah deal with him in the afterlife. Arafat was a murdering, vile, arrogant terrorist and the world is a better place without him. Let's just forget this abomination on mankind. May his passing be a large step toward establishing true peace in the Middle East.

More reaction to Kirshner column

Stephen Tannenbaum (Letters, Nov. 25) asks rhetorically "Just whose side is Sheldon Kirshner on?" Well, it seems to me that Kirshner is on the side of understanding, conciliation and, ultimately, peace in the Jewish homeland of Israel.

Sadly, there are too many people, on both sides, who want to pretend that their side, their view, their position is squeaky clean and on the side of God while the other side is black, foul and in league with the forces of darkness.

The particular column on Arafat so disturbed Tannenbaum, that he concluded it was a "shame on The CJN" for not censoring Kirshner's column. What did Kirshner write? That Arafat was an ambivalent figure. Is this not true? Was it not the case that not everyone on the earth saw Arafat as a cold-blooded villain? That's what Kirshner wrote: that Arafat was a controversial and ambivalent figure.

It would have been easy for Kirshner to write a diatribe against Arafat. But what would have been the point? We all know how deceitful, ruthless and corrupt Arafat was. But the responsible path was to also acknowledge that there are millions of people who saw him in another light.

One criticism that many followers of the Arab-Israeli conflict have of Arafat was that he didn't prepare his people for peace. Arafat didn't forthrightly tell his followers that the Jewish people have a valid claim to the Land of Israel, that the Jewish position has merit and that whatever was done in the past by Jewish forces must be understood from their point of view. The CJN, in contrast to Arafat, is preparing its readers for eventual peace by having Kirshner write with a balanced approach. It is a small part of the solution to the intractable problem of how to get two peoples to live together side by side without violence.

Praise for the organizers of Limmud

On Nov. 21, I had the privilege of attending the first North American Limmud Festival of Jewish Learning, held at York University in Toronto. I was one of some 400 participants who were treated to a full day of study and camaraderie. There were approximately 60 presentations to choose from, on topics from midrash to current affairs to cooking – something for everyone. The organization by Peter Sevitt and his team was outstanding – from the parking arrangements to the signage to the catering to the program – and all done with a smile and a warmth that made it all so pleasant. Over lunch, there was a moving and powerful address on human rights by Justice Minister Irwin Cotler ("Jewish values shape justice minister's work," CJN, Nov. 25).

Limmud began in Britain, where it has grown by leaps and bounds. Today, it attracts some 2,000 participants over three days. Seeing the commitment and dedication of the volunteers that I met, I feel confident that soon Toronto's Limmud will grow to that size.

To Sevitt and his team I say, "Kol hakavod" and thank you so much!

More praise for Limmud organizers

It was truly a mechaya to be able to taste from many different topics at this year's Limmud conference. From Jewish feminist poetry to the making of midrash, every speaker was knowledgeable and engaging. To top it all off, Justice Minister Irwin Cotler treated us to his passionate views on tzedek/justice ("Jewish values shape justice minister's work," CJN, Nov. 25). But the credit has to go to the organizers who thought of every little detail, from kosher food to free parking. One day was not enough. We can only hope that this will become a regular event in Toronto.

The UN shows some balance

By AVI BEKER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The proposal on the issue of religious tolerance approved last week by the United Nations – with the inclusion for the first time of a denunciation of, and concern for, the spread of anti-Semitism – does not express a historical revolution in the organization's voting patterns. But it certainly does send a symbolic message that could have diplomatic significance.

The resolution, adopted by the UN's Third Committee: Economic, Social and Cultural Matters, "recognizes with deep concern the overall rise in instances of intolerance and violence directed against members of many religious communities in various parts of the world, including cases motivated by Islamophobia, anti-Semitism and Christianophobia."

The steadfastness displayed this time by Europe in the face of the bloc of Arab and Muslim countries led to the rejection of their proposed amendment, which sought to remove any mention of anti-Semitism from the resolution. The forces that came together to pass the resolution represent the United States, Russia, Europe and the UN members, who, each for its own reasons, are interested in playing a role in the new Middle East after (Palestinian Authority president Yasser) Arafat.

Thus, even though the resolution itself is quite loosely worded and lacks practical application, it is important because the inclusion of anti-Semitism among the terms that express religious intolerance represents a clear Arab-Muslim failure. Last year, Europe withdrew under Arab pressure, and Israel was the only country to abstain in the vote, in protest of the omission of the denunciation of anti-Semitism.

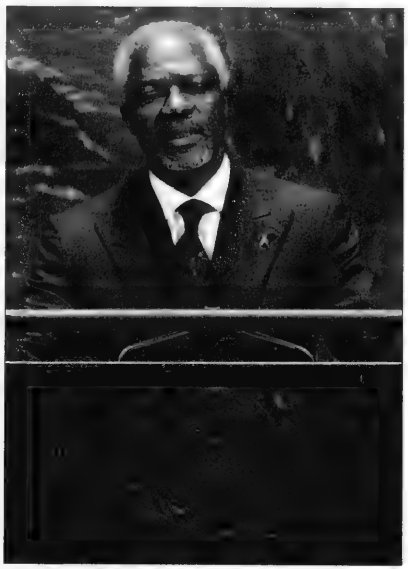
The struggle against anti-Semitism has lately found official expression in decisions by the European Union and the U.S. to set up mechanisms for tracking displays of anti-Semitism. At first Europe refused to recognize that there has been a rise in overt anti-Semitism on that continent, and it was only because of American pressure that Europe was forced to deal with the issue.

The result was the conference on anti-Semitism in June 2003, sponsored by the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe, which unites 55 countries. Russia, the U.S. and Canada also participated in the conference.

American and Jewish pressure also led to both the EU and the UN holding seminars over the past year focusing on the rise in anti-Semitism, particularly in Europe. The Arabs, in policy declarations and in the media, expressed their wrath at the establishment of tracking bodies in Europe and America.

They were particularly infuriated earlier this month when U.S. President George W. Bush signed a law approving the separate tracking of anti-Semitism. Bush worked together with Congress despite the protestations of the State Department, which did not want give anti-Semitism a separate tracking mechanism.

It is quite likely that Europe, too, is becoming increasingly aware that the threat of extremist Islam is a problem for more than just the Jews. Particularly conspicuous is the determination of Holland, which recently became the battleground in the struggle between Muslim extremists and rightists. As acting president of the EU, Holland demonstrated considerable fortitude in the face of pressure from Arab and Islamic countries to delete anti-Semitism from the UN resolution.



UN Secretary General Kofi Annan

Just as the adoption of the resolution by the UN Third Committee is a purely declarative move that does not recognize the fact that anti-Semitism is a unique phenomenon in its expression and scope, so too does it not mean that the UN recognizes that incitement against the State of Israel's right to exist is also anti-Semitism.

It must be remembered that more than 20 anti-Israel resolutions are due to be approved, as they are every year, by the UN General Assembly. This Third Committee resolution will therefore aid the UN in regaining a little legitimacy in the face of the increasing calls in the U.S. to cut financial support to the UN if it does not undergo structural and political change.

The UN and its secretary general, Kofi Annan, who suffered harsh criticism over the food-for-oil deal with Iraq on the grounds that it was also being used to finance terror, can now prove that the UN is still relevant and "balanced," and can still contribute to the peace process.

Europe, which was also criticized for its lax treatment of violent anti-Semitism, will now want to use this resolution as a lever for renewed activity in the Middle East. Europe will now tell the Israeli government that it cannot deny European involvement, and will explain to the Arabs that in order to advance on the diplomatic track, it must remain faithful to the struggle against religious intolerance.

United Nations condemns anti-Semitism

By RACHEL POMERANCE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

A United Nations resolution on anti-Semitism proves the axiom that Europe is the fulcrum about which action, or inaction, takes place at the world body.

In this case it was the former. Jewish officials praised Europeans for standing firm against pressure from the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) to remove a reference to anti-Semitism in a resolution condemning religious intolerance.

The resolution calling for the "elimination of all forms of religious intolerance" unanimously passed the Third Committee of the UN General Assembly on Monday and is expected to pass the entire General Assembly in a few weeks.

It's not the first time a UN committee has condemned anti-Semitism – it has been included in condemnations of religious intolerance in the Commission on Human Rights in Geneva, where only 53 countries are members – but it was the first time anti-Semitism was included in the annual resolution on religious intolerance in the General Assembly's much larger Third Committee.

The committee is the assembly's social and humanitarian body, with jurisdiction over human rights issues.

This also was one of the few times European countries have stood up to the pressure of OIC on a Jewish issue, observers said.

Attempts to obtain comment from representatives of the Netherlands, which holds the European Union's rotating presidency, were unsuccessful. Israeli officials called the resolution a breakthrough.

Last year, Israel abstained from voting on the religious intolerance resolution at the General Assembly because it didn't mention anti-Semitism, despite a spike in anti-Semitic acts around the world.

Many Jewish officials had sought a stand-alone resolution condemning anti-Semitism this year. Ireland offered a resolution singling out anti-Semitism for condemnation last year, but withdrew it due to lack of support.

The Europeans didn't think they could pass a stand-alone resolution on anti-Semitism this year either, so offered this as a compromise, said Amy Goldstein, director of UN affairs for B'nai Brith International.

The resolution that passed last week "recognizes with deep concern the overall rise in instances of intolerance and violence directed against members of many religious communities in various parts of the world, including cases motivated by Islamophobia, anti-Semitism and Christianophobia."

It comes after several conferences on anti-Semitism in the past year, including an April 2004 meeting of the Organization of Security and Co-operation in Europe that concluded that international developments – an oblique reference to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict – never justify anti-Semitism.

The resolution also comes after the United Nations hosted its first day-long conference on anti-Semitism in June. In his opening remarks to that gathering, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said, "Let us acknowledge that the United Nations' record on anti-Semitism has at times fallen short of our ideals. The General Assembly resolution of 1975, equating Zionism with racism, was an especially unfortunate decision."

For many, the resolution was a step toward righting that history.

But others called the step minuscule.

Canadian scholar Anne Bayefsky, a senior fellow at the Hudson Institute and visiting professor at Touro College and Metropolitan College, said the UN has only come "about a millimetre" from its summer conference acknowledging a biased history.

"It's one word in one paragraph in one general resolution on religious intolerance. It's a very far cry from a resolution dedicated to anti-Semitism," she said. "A resolution which focuses on the phenomenon of anti-Semitism would be able to deal with all forms of anti-Semitism, including the demonization of the State of Israel, and this does not do anything like that."

Opinions

Living life on tippy toes

Life is short. This old cliché became a cliché because it is so true.

Nevertheless, we ignore this piece of wisdom, and live our daily lives as if we're immortal. That is, until we confront a tragedy.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Then, we are shocked by how absurdly fragile life really is, and realize that time flies by ridiculously fast. All of a sudden, we're no longer immortal, and life is much too short. And we're left wondering how to deal with our lilliputian lifespans.

Well, if you observe some of the shortest people, children, you'll see they have a fascinating way of coping with shortness: they stand on tippy toes. If they have to look over a taller person, they stand on tippy toes. If they have to reach something up high, they stand on tippy toes. They seem to be forever standing on tippy toes, trying to be just a few inches taller.

Perhaps what we need to do is live life on tippy toes. Yes, life might be short, but we can always find ways to stretch it a bit further.

One way to live life on tippy toes is by grabbing hold of peak moments. To a clock, all time is absolutely equal: each second has a uniform length. However, for humans, all minutes are not created equal. There are many mediocre minutes and some sensational seconds.

For us, a minute spent standing under the chupah waiting to get married is far more important than a minute spent standing in line at the grocery store. One experience is forgettable; the other is a peak moment. Life stretches just a bit longer when we seek out and savour our peak moments.

Exceptional events such as weddings and bar mitzvahs are clearly peak moments. But there are other peak moments, less obvious but no less remarkable. Like volunteering at a soup kitchen. Tucking a child into bed. Taking your mom out for lunch. Going for coffee with your spouse. Having Friday night dinner with friends. We overlook the little peak moments, and often do more "important" things, like work. But no one ever sat on their deathbed wondering why they didn't spend more time working. But I can attest, people do sit on their deathbeds wondering where the pitter- patter of little feet have gone, and why they let their loving spouses slip away. They wonder why their lives seem so short, having neglected to live on tippy toes.

The midrash says at the end of holiday season, God asked the Jews to stay for one more day of rejoicing. After a wonderful week of festivities, God simply can't let go of a peak moment, and needs one more day of celebration. I believe this is meant as a model for all of us; we must try to hang on to our peak moments, stretching time a bit further. We do this because life is short, and we must live on tippy toes.

Arafat and Derrida's assault on truth

The worldwide eulogies lionizing former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat were predictable, as was the United Nation's flag flying at half-mast.

Still, it was surprising how many simply glossed over Arafat's methods. Ignoring terrorism when assessing Arafat is like evaluating Robin Hood without mentioning stealing or Adolf Hitler without mentioning anti-Semitism.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Here, then, is an underappreciated but corrosive aspect of Arafat's legacy. It is bad enough that the world excused Arafat's addiction to terror, making the reprehensible debatable, then justifiable. In blithely ignoring terror, too many politicians, journalists and intellectuals demonstrated that Arafat's assault on Western civilization was not simply physical – Arafat debased truth itself.

Arafat was lucky to bully his way onto the world stage at a critical passage in intellectual history. The 1960s rebellion against authority rejected traditional, linear notions of truth and storytelling. The French philosopher Jacques Derrida, who also died this fall, was among the many intellectuals who questioned excessive literalism. Derrida's idea of deconstruction – especially as distorted and popularized – made everything relative: searching for hidden meaning in texts highlighted authors' ever-shifting perspectives rather than a text's clarity and authority. At the same time, "Third Worldism" became epidemic in governmental and intellectual circles. Noble movements such as the civil rights movement and the fight against apartheid combined with the gap in wealth and power between modern liberal democracies and struggling former colonies produced a distorted doctrine that only finger-pointed one way. Somehow, only whites could be racist, historic "victims" could use violence freely – and modern democracies were always wrong. Unidirectional Third Worldism gave the world's "oppressed" tremendous tactical latitude with minimal moral culpability, while putting the onus on the perceived oppressors, usually western powers.

Arafatism applied these abstractions to reality. Terrorism came to be "in the eye of the beholder," and one person's terrorist became another's freedom fighter. A modern theory of relativity drained words of their meaning and politicized everything, consistently rationalizing inconsistency and sanitizing the ends to justify nefarious means. Pragmatists who tried distinguishing between "good" terrorism and "bad" terrorism at least had some intellectual integrity because they acknowledged reality. But Arafat's terrorism – hijacking planes from Europe in 1970, killing Israeli Olympic Athletes in Munich in 1972, shooting American diplomats in the Sudan in 1973, slaughtering Israeli schoolchildren in Ma'alot in 1974 – was too evil, too unpalatable. Similarly, Arafat's role in turning toward terror after Camp David 2000 was too problematic for those who cast him as the Palestinian Nelson Mandela. The documents Israeli soldiers found linking Arafat to the Al Aqsa terrorists via receipts for reimbursements and rewards, let alone his harsh jihadist rhetoric, again proved too dissonant for the preferred narrative. Better to render Arafat's crimes invisible, blaming Israeli defenders against the terror for the troubles.

When it became too difficult to deconstruct and relativize, many eulogists retreated to the ubiquitous "cycle of violence" posture. Treating the violence Arafat spawned as a meteorological phenomenon absolved the Palestinians' top terrorist of responsibility. Softpedalling Arafat's role in the collapse of Oslo, a Montreal Gazette obituary reported, vaguely, that in 2000 "terrorist attacks stepped up and frightened many average Israelis." Such reporting made the attacks seem natural, uncontrollable events like winter storms.

In April 2002, at an anti-globalization and supposed "pro-peace" rally in Washington, pro-Palestinian protestors held up signs supporting suicide bombers saying, "Martyrs not murderers." These mostly 20-something, Nike-clad, latte-sipping, self-righteous armchair warriors, blithely justifying the murder of commuters, café-goers and Passover seder participants, are the bastard children of Arafat's murders and Derrida's musings. Arafat was not just the Typhoid Mary of international diplomacy, spreading the bug of terrorism worldwide by demonstrating how his violent tactics could work; Arafatism was a moral virus to which modern intellectuals proved particularly susceptible. When otherwise peaceful people support violence, judge western countries harshly and disproportionately, ignore the sexism or sadism or even racism of "people of colour," mortgage their critical faculties to support "a cause," they further Arafat's epistemological epidemic, his assault on truth, linearity and consistency.

Arafat is now dead and buried. But his signature tactic – terrorism – survives, as does the modernist tendency to distort reality to perpetuate political postures. Tragically, typically, Arafat's funeral – and its coverage – epitomized this phenomenon, which is as intellectually bankrupt as it is morally disreputable.

Picturing shame and mortality

Why the photographs? When the Israeli daily newspaper Yediot Achronot broke the ghastly news of the desecration of Palestinian bodies by a group of Israeli Defence Forces soldiers, evidenced by two-year-old photographs, readers were appalled. The soldiers had posed alongside their handiwork – manipulations of dead bodies and body parts designed to humiliate and mock the dead.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

The desecration was shameful. More horrifying is the idea of the photographs. That a soldier under stress might do the wrong thing, one could comprehend. IDF soldiers repeatedly confront an enemy that sends its youth, laden with explosives, to murder randomly among a civilian population. Moreover, IDF soldiers frequently do battle not against other soldiers on a battlefield, but in village streets and in private homes. Fear for one's safety, for that of one's family and for one's country was, as it were, propitiated in a primitive desecration of the body of the enemy. No country should be proud of this behaviour, but it is in the realm of the imaginable.

But to photograph this desecration is of a different order

I was reminded of the photographs taken by the American soldiers who abused their Iraqi captives in the Abu Ghraib prison. The abusive behaviour can be explained, at least in part, as the brutalizing effect of war. But why the photographs?

What possesses people to retain and distribute a record of such behaviour? The photographs are, in a sense, war trophies, or souvenirs of a military tourism. Both the photographer and the photographed soldier must assume that folks back home would find amusing or reassuring or inspirational the humiliation of the enemy. The photographs turn rage, or fear, or superstition into something else, something more shameful, by implying that the behaviour might be a source of personal and communal pride.

Thinking about those photographs reminded me of a blind date with a medical student during my university years. I no longer remember his name, but I remember vividly the photograph he showed me of himself, taken in the lab, where first-year students familiarize themselves with human anatomy by dissecting cadavers. The photo showed him holding up some intestines with an oversized fork, as though eating spaghetti.

Med student humour, he chuckled to me. We never had a second date. But I understood: the macabre charade was a way to deal with the inevitable queasiness. It spoke of the shared stress and communal coping of his cohort group. It was, as well, a means to distance oneself from the uncomfortable fact of mortality revealed in the entrails of the cadaver that was once a living, thinking man or woman, and was now an educational tool.

The photographed desecration of Palestinian bodies is neither the bad-taste hijinks of nervous medical students, nor the abuse and torture of Iraqi prisoners. It lies somewhere in between the two, and has something in common with both: it sees the other's viscera as something not human.

By all available accounts, IDF authorities did the right thing. Chief of Staff Gen. Moshe Yaalon and Chief Rabbi Brig. Gen. Israel Weiss deplored the desecration of the dead and the breach in military and Jewish ethics, and called for an investigation, with the intention of disciplining the guilty.

What do we make of this episode? Some will see the offending soldiers as an aberration, a departure from the normative moral order that governs Israel's military. Others will see them as an integral part of a culture that has abandoned its moral vision, symbols of the corruption of the Zionist dream.

It is both. The deplorable actions are a breach in propriety and morality, and at the same time, they are a part of the culture's dark side. In more ways than one, the episode is the product of a long and difficult governing of another people. The perpetrators will no doubt be disciplined, but they and their failings must also be owned. They have photographed a dark crevice in the national soul.

The writer Susan Sontag has noted that photographs, by nature, are memento mori, reminders of death, of our own mortality, and that of others. The idea of the photographs should remind us of our own humanness and also that of the people with whom we are currently in conflict, and the price of forgetting that common bond.

The Kirshner File

The battle to preserve Israel's environment

The Yarkon River, which flows into the Mediterranean Sea around the northern suburbs of Tel Aviv, is a toxic stream polluted by oils and heavy metals.

Judging by an 1891 travel guide, the Yarkon was once in fairly pristine condition. But by the mid-1950s, having been harnessed to deliver water to settlements in the Negev, the river had deteriorated into what one observer bluntly described as "a smelly trickle of sewage."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

On July 14, 1997, Israelis learned firsthand just how dangerously filthy the Yarkon had become. A bridge that had been hastily built across the narrow river to funnel athletes to the opening ceremonies of the Maccabiah Games collapsed, plunging members of the Australian team into the grimy water. Within an hour or so after arriving at the hospital, the Australians were tottering on the edge of asphyxia, a serious respiratory ailment.

The tragic accident, which killed several of the athletes and damaged the health of a few others, highlighted an unpalatable fact, as Alon Tal writes in Pollution in a Promised Land (University of California Press): "The Zionist quest for Jewish national rejuvenation through aggressive economic development has produced an appalling environmental legacy."

Since finishing this enlightening book, I have read of still more environmental disasters in Israel.

The Kishon River, a receptacle for the acidic effluents of Haifa's petrochemical industry, was rendered still more polluted when a sewage line burst, killing countless fish and marine animals.

Air pollution in Israeli cities has reached carcinogenic levels.

But despite these calamities, the Zionist movement has not necessarily been incompatible with environmentalism.

Zionist educators were always sensitive to the natural world, and the commitment to preserve Israel's landscape was a widely held ethos, both in theory and practice.

This passion for the land explains why the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel is the largest membership organization in the country today.

Yet, as Tal points out, there is a darker side to the traditional Zionist reverence for nature.

All Zionists, whether secular or religious, shared an ideological fervour about "redeeming" the land for farming and national purposes.

Citrus production led the way, and although orange, lemon and grapefruit groves were planted on only four per cent of Palestine's eight million hectares of cultivated lands, they generated 80 per cent of the Yishuv's export revenues. But the fertilizers that were so useful in boosting yield were the primary source of the nitrates that fouled the groundwater under the western coastal plain.

Alongside agriculture, industrial development was the motor of the Zionist project. As many Jews were employed in factories and small workshops as in agriculture, according to the 1931 census. And the influx of German Jews into British-Mandate Palestine after the rise of Nazism spurred economic expansion, particularly in metal trades, textiles and chemicals.

But there was a price to be paid.

Emissions from the smokestacks of the Nesher Cement plant became so severe in the 1960s and 1970s that they sparked the first real grassroots movement for air quality in Haifa. And the mining operations of the Palestine Potash Company obliterated the natural vistas of the southern Dead Sea area.

In the name of reclamation and health, the Jewish National Fund drained much of the mosquito-infested Hulah Valley swamp in northern Israel. The valley, however, was an ecological treasure trove, containing the greatest concentration of aquatic plants in the Middle East, 18 species of fish and a rich flock of migratory birds.

Tal argues that when the project was completed in 1958, the original rationale for draining this wetland was no longer compelling. With the introduction of DDT, malaria had been brought under control. And besides, alternative lands could have been developed more cheaply. Recognizing these facts, the JNF began reflooding parts of the Hulah Valley.

The fabled Jordan River, having been diverted and tapped by agricultural projects, has suffered from too much development.

Only a 14-kilometre segment north of the Sea of Galilee, its steep gradient ideal for white-water rafting, has remained intact.

As for the Sea of Galilee, Israel's only lake, its waters have been dirtied by pollutants from Tiberias and neighbouring kibbutzim dotting its shoreline.

Of late, Israeli environmentalists have rallied against the construction of the Trans-Israel Highway, which is expected to gobble up thousands of hectares of countryside, farmland and forests.

Biblical and talmudic citations suggest that Israel was heavily forested in ancient times, with about 20 species of trees. Josephus, the Jewish Roman historian, wrote: "For this land is a blooming garden, and in it grow a great quantity of precious and extremely beautiful fruit trees of all kinds."

But due to human abuse, military campaigns, overgrazing and soil erosion, Palestine was ravaged by deforestation.

The Carmel National Park [Sheldon Kirshner photo]

By the turn of the 19th century, no more than 100 square kilometres of natural woodlands still survived, broken up into small, isolated groves.

Theodor Herzl, the founder of political Zionism, was shocked by the scarcity of trees when he visited Palestine in 1898.

During the Mandate era, the British planted 20 million trees, but it was left to the JNF to revolutionize the practice of tree planting.

Its efforts to recreate old forests were designed to prevent erosion, stop sand dunes, mitigate the effects of dust storms and assert Jewish land ownership.

"Trees not only transformed the landscape into something more familiar and hospitable," observes Tal. "The woods also evoked the freedom of the European settlers' youth. They were a source of spiritual renewal, a validating biological symbol of their hopes for a Jewish and Hebrew cultural renaissance."

The eucalyptus, imported from Australia and used around the world to dry wetlands, was the tree of choice prior to the 1920s. So common was the tree that Palestinian Arabs called it shajarat a-Yahud, or "the Jew tree."

Subsequently, the Aleppo pine dominated Israeli forests, selected as the tree of choice because it could adapt to different climates and seasonal rain patterns.

Israeli conservationists worked ceaselessly to protect old-growth forests. Their biggest successes came during the campaigns to establish the Carmel National Park, near Haifa, and a nature preserve on Mount Meron, in the northern Galilee.

In tandem with these important conservation efforts, ecologists won the battle to reintroduce to Israel biblical animals and birds such as hawks, vultures, fallow deer, wild asses and white oryx.

In spite of these ecological victories, green open spaces are fast disappearing in Israel. Indeed, demographic trends suggest that early in this century, the northern half of Israel will be twice as crowded as Holland, Europe's most densely populated nation.

Israel's first minister of the environment, Yossi Sarid, railed against the vanishing Israeli landscape at every opportunity, but he could do only so much.

Ascribing overcrowding to population pressures, Tal warns that Israel's population density is now roughly 270 people per square kilometre, greater than that of India and homing in on Japan.

"If one subtracts the generally uninhabited Negev desert, the population density per square kilometre rises to over 500, making Israel the most densely populated western country."

Tal adds that it is incumbent on Israel to strike a balance between development and conservation, lest it become a congested city state like Hong Kong or Singapore.

In his opinion, the JNF has a pivotal role to play in preserving Israel's vanishing open spaces, and he urges environmentalists to embrace the JNF as a powerful ally.

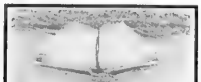
Chanukah: Jew versus Jew

By RABBI MATTHEW KAUFMAN

Next Tuesday evening, we light the first candle for Chanukah. As we reflect on the miracle of Chanukah, we are reminded that the miracle is not only that of the cruse of oil that burned for eight days.



The apocryphal Book of Maccabees records the Hasmonean military victory over the Seleucid Greeks. Recalling this important aspect of Chanukah highlights for us the miracle of a military victory of an oppressed minority against an anti-Jewish regime.

There are those who understand the Chanukah story as a tribute to pluralism. They point out that the Maccabean military victory enabled Judaism to be practised freely, overcoming the threat of extinction by the despotic Seleucid monarch. Thus, they argue Chanukah is a triumphant celebration of the legitimacy of varied religious expression and a reminder of the need for tolerance.

Far from elevating pluralism and tolerance, the Chanukah story in point of fact actually challenges these ideals in favour of a more religiously zealous and sectarian vision. The Book of Maccabees records that Mattathias the Hasmonean, the leader of the revolt, in one of his first acts of rebellion kills an apostate Jew about to offer up a sacrifice on an altar. This single act of violence highlights the struggle happening at the time between a zealously religious Jewish population, and a comfortably Hellenized urban Jewish population. The Maccabean struggle was as much against the urban elite who was at home with a Hellenized Judaism as it was against the military forces of Antiochus Epiphanes. Chanukah, therefore, bids us to consider the issue of violent struggle of Jew versus Jew.

This is of particular relevance today, because we in North America are witness to an unprecedented internal divisiveness within the Jewish community. Haredi, Reform, Orthodox, Reconstructionist and Conservative Jewish communities level harsh criticisms against one another, in what Rabbi Irving Greenberg has called the "tragic situation where good and committed Jews are predicating their survival strategies on the disappearance of other Jews."

We are witness today to a war of words, to the vilification of whole groups of Jews by other groups of Jews, and the noise is crescendoing to a deafening level. The rising decibels of insults obscure the fact that this is a struggle that has been taking place since before the Maccabean revolt more than 2,000 years ago. It is a struggle not between denominations, but between the natural impulses toward two opposite ends of the spectrum – assimilation and separation. Or, more kindly put, between the attempt to synthesize one culture with another and the attempt to maintain the unique character of Judaism.

Thinking back to Mattathias' execution of that assimilated Jew more than 2,000 years ago, we see that the struggle between those who insist on a unified Judaism and those who insist on a pluralist Judaism is not a new issue. Nor is it an issue that was at any time resolved in favour of one faction over another. Although the Hasmoneans did achieve victory, in an ironic twist in history, the Hasmonean dynasty, in a short span of time, adopted exactly that brand of Hellenized Judaism they had so violently opposed in the past.

The tension that exists within our community (or, rather, communities) is an opportunity for serious introspection. Zealous advocates for a unified Judaism must beware the threat to freedom of expression and difference in their approach. Passionate pluralists must consider the "slippery slope" arguments levied against them. Neither approach is truly the ideal approach, but both offer bright lights to follow. As we approach the festival of lights, let us resolve to see within all of our fellow Jews our individual lights that together make up our chanukiyah that we call Judaism. The lesson of Chanukah for today

By BARUCH COHEN

Guest Voice

In 167 BCE, Judea was a scene of total destruction. A Syrian garrison was encamped near the desecrated temple, and the worship of the God of Israel had been supplanted by the cult of Zeus.

King Antiochus' officials roamed the land ordering the Jews to obey the reprehensible royal edicts calling for national apostasy. And in the deserts and mountain gorges, Judean patriots, outraged by the atrocities of the despotic king, prepared to raise the banner of revolt against the oppressors of their homeland.

During this time of turmoil, there lived in the town of Modi'in, in the Judean hills between Jerusalem and Jaffa, a priest, Mattathias ben Jochanan of the Hasmonean family. He and his five sons, Jochanan, Simon, Judah, Jonathan and Elatar, were among the active patriots who strove to prepare the people for an armed uprising against the oppressors.

The heroic 25-year struggle for independence would ultimately be crowned with success when the nation acquired not only religious freedom, but also political freedom.

Chanukah, which literally means "dedication," tells the story of the Maccabees who fought for Jewish beliefs, traditions and values. It is a story of Jewish commitment, vitality and dynamism. Bravery and unflinching adherence to the values of Torah law characterize the Jewish heroes and heroines of the Chanukah story.

Judah Maccabee and his men celebrated the first Chanukah: "They built high walls and strong towers around Mount Zion, so that the gentiles [would] never again come and destroy them, as they had done before," we read in 1 Maccabees.

The message and lesson of Chanukah are clear to anyone who reads the biblical books of the Maccabees. Only by following the lessons of our history can we rekindle the Chanukah spirit of our tradition and give the Jewish people the strength to be a light unto the nations.

Nothing is more miraculous than the survival, both physically and spiritually, of the Jewish people. (This year, we recall, two Israeli scientists received the Nobel Prize.)

While celebrating Chanukah 5765, let us remember the heroes and heroines of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising of 1943 who never put down their weapons nor gave up their faith. Let us remember the innocent and beloved people who were killed by the hands of murderous terrorists, and our brave new Maccabees, our Israeli soldiers who have fallen in the ongoing struggle for the freedom, independence and security of the Land of Israel, the Jewish state.

The waves of hatred that we are witnessing today focus not only on Israel, but also on the Jewish people wherever they are. "Old Europe" is again leading the storm of hatred against the Jewish people. We have a long history of surviving – and so we defy the current thugs, murderers and haters, as we defied all our enemies before them. We go on, one generation following the other, we remember, and our roots in our ancient Israel, our old-new homeland, grow stronger and stronger.

We must never, ever, let history repeat itself. We must – and we will – remember!

Contrasting stories, one truth

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

This year, the holiday of Chanukah coincides with the Torah readings about Joseph in Egypt. An interesting parallel becomes apparent when we examine these two moments in our history and the challenges they present.

Joseph was one of many sons born to a great leader, Jacob. Born outside of the Land of Israel, then called Canaan, Joseph lived in Israel during his youth but ends up enslaved in Egypt. After tremendous hardships and dramatic events, Joseph lived the latter part of his life as second-in-command in Egypt – second only to Pharaoh. Joseph rose to great leadership in a foreign land, overseeing a foreign empire, and he lived out the rest of his life and died as an Egyptian leader. What Joseph did not live to see was the enslavement of his descendants and those of his brothers.

Chanukah introduces us to another family of leaders, the Hasmoneans. Judah the Maccabee is one of many sons born to a great leader, Mattityahu. The events of the story of Chanukah unfold within the Land of Israel. There is also a mighty empire present in this story, the Greeks and the Hellenists. Judah the Maccabee leads the Jewish people to a great victory in the Land of Israel and re-consecrates the Temple so that worship can be restored. It is a moment of religious and national autonomy within the Land of Israel. What Judah did not live to see was the later corruption brought into leadership by his descendants.

The two narratives, about Joseph and about Chanukah, stand as a study in opposites. Joseph was a leader of a foreign people in a foreign land. Egypt, the empire he has come to know, offered refuge and shelter to Joseph's family in a time of famine. He came to trust the foreign empire and that trust was passed on to future generations. Perhaps that trust created a blindspot when a new Pharaoh changed the society and enslaved the Jewish people.

Judah was a Jewish leader of the Jewish people within a Jewish land. The empire in this story is a hostile one. It is not offering refuge and food, but rather persecution and death. Judah and his army were victorious in fighting off the evil and establishing an independent Jewish leadership. They trusted that they were now able to assert their identities in times of war and that trust was passed to future generations. Maybe it was that trust that created a blindspot about whether their identity can remain strong in times of peace.

As we light our Chanukah candles, we read about Joseph in Egypt – opposite stories affirming a singular truth: that Jewish identity should never be taken for granted. Neither war nor peace, nor evil or benevolent empires, define the Jewish soul. It stands beyond these shifting tides and deserves our trust.

In the words of Rabbah Bar Hanah: "The soul of one righteous person equals in measure the entire world."

Chanukah, kids and the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Is there another Jewish holiday that is so geared toward kids as Chanukah? Sure, Purim has costumes and mishloach manot. And Passover has seders and the afikoman. Actually, most of the holidays are geared toward kids. But right now, it's time to focus on the Festival of Lights. Let's look at some great Chanukah websites for kids – and start off with games.

Can a little top made of plastic or wood (or clay) compete for kids' attention in a time when most games seem to have gone high-tech? I hope so. If you'd like to brush up on rules for spinning the dreidel, ("Gimel" means "gantz" or take the whole kitty, etc.) take a look at the Torah Tots site. [http://tinyurl.com/69n6a] Then try your luck online. CyberKids' web-based dreidel not only challenges you, it also keeps score and plays Dreidel, Dreidel, Dreidel. [http://tiny url.com/45uzd]

At the KidsDomain site, kids can try to spot 10 tiny differences between the Chanukah pictures. After that, children will enjoy the personalized Holiday Latkes story. Before they can read the story, they are asked to type in their name and the names of friends or siblings. Press the button and you get a story with them at the centre. [www.kidsdomain.com/games/chan.html] For a more nonsensical version, try Virtual Jerusalem's Chanukah Madlibs. [http://tinyurl.com/6ygcj]

Young kids will love the Tic-Tac-Toe online dreidel game. The old rules apply. The only difference is that they will be playing against one of the dumbest computer programs ever created and will have no problem winning. [http://tinyurl.com/6cl7o] Chanukah Concentration challenges you to click on boxes to uncover and find pairs of identical object in as few turns as possible. [http://tinyurl.com/6zcyh]

The Hanukkah House is a simple yet lovely page that allows anyone to create a holiday scene while picking up a few words in Hebrew. On the right side of the screen, you see a list of Hebrew words like "chanukiya," "ner" (candle) and "delet" (door). As you drag the word to middle of the screen, it turns into a picture of that object. [www.zigzag world.com/draw/]

Chabad has done a great job using multimedia to allow us to experience Chanukah in places we wouldn't normally have access to. Visit a kosher Chanukah candle factory. Watch as olives are picked, sorted and pressed to create pure oil. And in "An Astronaut's Chanukah Adventure," join Jeff Hoffman as he celebrates the holiday aboard the Space Shuttle Discovery. Dreidels in zero gravity? [http://tinyurl.com/6srav]

Of course, Chanukah isn't all fun and games. Learn more about the holiday at the Aish Hatorah site. [http://tinyurl.com/5hgvh] And now test your Chanukah Knowledge. Are holiday candles lit from (a) left to right; (b) right to left, or (c) top to bottom? [http://tinyurl.com/3lgrj]

If your kids have exhausted this list (and you at the same time) don't worry. There are lots more Chanukah kids' sites to keep them challenged. Try out Children of the Moon [www.mooncildren.com/holidays/chanukah/], JR Hotsites [http://tinyurl.com/6ghsj] and a site created by Fayette County (Kentucky) Public Schools. [http://tinyurl.com/5muqj]

I'd like to point out a very important page that I came across at TorahTots. "Play it Safe for Chanukah" reminds us that much of Chanukah is celebrated around an open flame or a hot stove. Some safety recommendations:

- Do not place the menorah near draperies or anything that might easily catch fire.
- If using decorative electric menorahs, use only UL-approved appliances and cords.
- When frying latkes, always keep baking soda and a cover for the frying pan nearby.

[www.torahtots.com/holidays/chanuka/safety.htm]

Finally, I think every child (and adult) will be fascinated by a printable diagram created by the Orthodox Union. The Our Way Chanukah Candle Lighting Blessings Chart not only reminds you about candlelighting order, it also shows you how to recite all the blessings in sign language. [www.ou.org/ncsy/ourway/chan.htm] Once you've mastered them, you can learn the signs for "dreidel" (spinning your right hand with index finger pointed), Chanukah (eight fingers pointed upward) and potato latkes (which begins, of course, with two hands being drawn toward the stomach.)

Benevolent society still going strong after 87 years

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The history of the Sons of Jacob Benevolent Society, which recently entered its 87th year, mirrors the growth and development of the Toronto Jewish community.

The society's current president, Joe Goren, says the records show that the organization, founded in 1918, was formed "to do good works and [give] charitable donations." Its first meeting was held in the Zionist Building, then located at 206 Beverley St.

In 1919, Sons of Jacob formed a ladies auxiliary, and Goren believes it was the first charitable group to do so.

At the time, there were few organizations or agencies to help the rapidly growing Jewish community. The handful of founders of Sons of Jacob recognized the need to provide cemetery plots, to assist the aged, to support what was then called Palestine and to hold meetings to spotlight problems faced by Jews throughout the world.

The society's first president was H. Brankstone. Apparently, no one remembers what his first name was, for at that time, only initials were used and women went only by their husband's initials.

Brankstone wrote in the organization's Silver Jubilee souvenir book in 1943: "Over the past quarter of a century, our organization took an active interest in almost every Jewish problem and with open hand and warm heart helped seek a solution.

"Amongst the many worthy causes towards which we made contributions, we constantly included the cause of Zionism, the cause of the talmud Torahs, the Old Folks' Home and immigration aid."

Seen at a meeting of the Sons of Jacob Benevolent Society are, front row from left, president Joe Goren, vice-president Sheldon Rajesky, marshal Ray Pines and recording secretary Shelley Cladman. Back row, from left, are social chair Marvin Goodman and financial secretary Harry Banikin.

The group raised significant amounts of money for many years. For example, in 1919, it brought the well-known Cantor Josef Rosenblatt to Toronto for a fundraiser and had a net profit of $1,000, which was donated to the Palestine Fund, to help European Jews settle in what is now Israel.

A loan syndicate, which was formed in 1923 and chartered in 1929, distributed some $500,000 in small loans of $50 to $100 to society members in the first 20 years.

Community programs were held throughout the 1930s and '40s to make people aware of the pogroms against Jews in Romania, the rise of Nazism and other areas of persecution.

In that period, Sons of Jacob was one of the largest organizations in Toronto and the membership was quickly growing.

Sons of Jacob had taken a leading role in the formation of Canadian Jewish Congress and later stepped in to assist the Brunswick Talmud Torah (later the Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto) when the school faced a financial crisis in 1935.

Throughout the war years, Sons of Jacob continued its efforts to bring people to Palestine and to help the war effort in Canada. They bought war bonds and furnished a room at the Canadian armed forces' Camp Borden, north of Toronto.

After the war, a number of charitable organizations were formed that took over many of the activities previously undertaken by members of Sons of Jacob. The society's membership began to decrease as many of its members became active in these other organizations and in the growing number of synagogues in Toronto.

Today, there are 60 members who meet once a month for a Sunday brunch and still hold several socials throughout the year. "We mainly socialize and discuss the distribution of funds," Goren says. "Some join for the cemetery plots we have on Dawes Road and at Pardes Shalom.

"We also send volunteers to such projects as Ezra Kadima, Canadian Magen David Adom, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and the Jewish National Fund."

They are anticipating their 90th anniversary, Goren says, adding, "We look forward to our monthly breakfasts for fellowship and fun and we are delighted when new members join Sons of Jacob."

For more information about Sons of Jacob Benevolent Society, call Goren at 416-787-7501 or membership chair Elliott Fine at 416-481-8472.

Disadvantaged kids get Chanukah gifts from drive

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Last year, when Bonnie Lawrence-Shear and two of her children – Bob and Josh Cooper – launched Drive for Dreidels, a Chanukah toy and gift drive for disadvantaged Jewish children in the GTA, there were only 10 days to go before Chanukah.

Undaunted by the time constraint, Lawrence-Shear and her sons went into high gear and started the collection campaign. They set a goal of 500 gifts and toys.

By the first night of Chanukah, the family had far exceeded their target. They had amassed 4,000 gifts and $3,000.

Bob Cooper, a teacher at the Toronto Heschel School and the director of Camp Shalom, was the impetus for Drive for Dreidels. Last year, less than two weeks before Chanukah, he had attended a conference on poverty. "We were trying to collectively figure out how to help raise awareness of poverty in the Jewish community.

"There are approximately 20,000 Jewish people living at or below the poverty line in the GTA and of that number, 3,000 are children."

The conference generated many ideas, including his plan for a toy drive for needy Jewish children, he recalls. A day after the conference, he raised the issue of the toy drive with his mother and brother at Shabbat dinner. By the end of the evening, the three had an action plan for Drive for Dreidels.

Lawrence-Shear is active with Holy Blossom Temple and she is the driving force behind the flegling Toronto Jewish Museum. Bob Cooper is involved in social action projects, which include working with the homeless through the Out of the Cold program at Har Zion Temple and with Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee.

His brother Josh, owner of Par Golf Camps and a father of two, wears many Jewish communal hats. Active in UJA Federation, he is co-chairing the United Israel Appeal Federations Canada Young Leadership Conference to be held in Toronto in April 2005.

Earlier this year, in conjunction with UJA Federation, he spearheaded a fund-raising campaign that amassed $75,000 to help United Talmud Torahs of Montreal. The school's library was destroyed by fire last Passover.

Once the family made the decision to proceed with the toy drive, they contacted Jewish Family Child Services (JF&CS) to see if the agency would be willing to distribute the gifts.

"We didn't want to get involved in the distribution, only in the collection of new unwrapped gifts," Josh Cooper explains, noting that cash donations were used for gift certificates and movie passes for the teenagers.

Once JF&CS gave its blessings, the campaign went forward at full speed.

Josh Cooper and Lawrence-Shear, a property manager, e-mailed their business associates and their offices, among other locations, became depots for the donations. Bob Cooper immediately got the Heschel School involved in the project, he says. "It was a grassroots drive. I wanted it to include kids and families in the community. The way we had promoted it, we said, 'While you're out shopping, buy an extra gift or two.' We're still promoting it that way. We say, 'Buy a gift that you would give to your child.'

"Heschel was great. We had sent a notice out to everybody overnight. Within a few days, we had tons of gifts coming in at both campuses."

JF&CS, which distributes the gifts at its annual Chanukah party, was thrilled with the results, says Josh Cooper.

"One of the workers told us that this was the first time that she knows of that every child in the GTA received a toy for Chanukah.

"You should have seen the board-room at the Lipa Green building. It was so full of toys, you couldn't open the door. JF&CS asked us if we'd do it again."

He says several corporations were very generous last year, among them Sandy Lion Sticker Designers and Ganz. These two companies, along with Spin Master Toys, are the sponsors of the 2004 campaign.

He notes that all cash donations will get a tax receipt though JF&CS. Cheques can be made out to the Bonnie Lawrence-Shear Drive for Dreidels.

Unwrapped gifts can be dropped off until Dec. 2 at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, 4588 Bathurst St.; Par Golf Camps, 821 Eglinton Ave. W; and the manager's suite at 200 St. Clair Ave. W.

For more information about Drive for Dreidels, contact Lawrence-Shear at 416-928-2988.

United Jewish Communities honour Toronto rabbis

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Jay Kelman and Rabbi Elyse Goldstein have serious ideological differences, but both share a willingness to engage in interdenominational dialogue and a dedication to adult Jewish education that they've translated into innovative programs.

At the General Assembly of United Jewish Communities in Cleveland two weeks ago, the two rabbis – one Orthodox and one Reform – received UJC rabbinical awards for "significant impact in their community," the only Canadians among 27 of their colleagues to be so honoured.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

"They both reach out beyond a narrow scope, and have created easy access points for the community. Also, both work transdenominationally. They see community in the broadest sense. They're wonderful role models," Susan Jackson, director of community planning, engagement and outreach for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, told The CJN.

Jackson has worked with Rabbi Kelman on Torah in Motion – the educational organization he formed three years ago, based on a traditional perspective – and with Rabbi Goldstein on Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, which Rabbi Goldstein launched 13 years ago. Both receive federation funding.

Torah in Motion, whose slogan is "Confronting the Challenges of Modernity," recently held its third annual conference, bringing together speakers representing widely divergent views within the Orthodox world. The organization now has a mailing list of 1,200 people, the vast majority of whom have attended programs, said Rabbi Kelman.

Similarly, Kolel has grown since its inception from 50 students a week to 200, who study in 18 classes. Its teachers represent the Reform, Conservative, Orthodox and Reconstructionist movements, sometimes in one forum teaching the same text from different perspectives. This year, Kolel ran its first mission to Israel.

Rabbi Goldstein's enthusiasm for her work is evident in her energetic speaking manner. "I've seen people go from no knowledge and no commitment to a deep understanding of the role Judaism plays in their lives," she said. "I've seen parents become more proactive, I've seen people convert because they've come through these doors, I've seen Jewish marriages get stronger. It's a very rewarding way to be a rabbi."

Rabbi Kelman, who has taught at Kolel, is one of a handful of Orthodox rabbis who will talk to Rabbi Goldstein, she said.

"I teach from my perspective, but I see no reason not to teach because I may disagree with the philosophical outlook of the organization," said Rabbi Kelman, who is spiritual leader of Beth Jacob V'Anshe Dridlz Congregation and was ordained at Yeshiva University.

Rabbi Jay Kelman

"I try to do what I think is right, regardless of the politics. The concept of Jewish unity is very important," he said, referring to the halachic concept of darchei shalom (the ways of peace).

Rabbi Kelman, who teaches many non-Orthodox students at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, believes it's important for non-Orthodox Jews to know what Orthodox Jews are thinking. "If we're going to break down the stereotypes [in both directions], it's very important that we talk to each other. We're all part of klal Yisrael."

The rabbi attributes his attitudes in part to his upbringing at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, a traditional Conservative congregation where his father, Rabbi Joseph Kelman, who was also ordained in the Orthodox movement, served for many years as spiritual leader.

"In my formative years, I grew up in a shul where people drove their cars to come to services every week. You see the religiosity in other people."

Also, he noted, his extended family includes rabbis spanning the spectrum from Reform to Orthodox. "Thank God, we all get along. There is a unity in the family despite our theological differences. I think it's a wonderful model."

Top court to hear claims of CJC plot

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The Supreme Court of Canada has agreed to hear a motion by a Quebec City lawyer to suspend proceedings against his client because Justice Minister Irwin Cotler and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) allegedly colluded in appointing Rosalie Abella to the court in order to influence the case's outcome.

Guy Bertrand had asked the Supreme Court not to hear Ottawa's appeal of a 2003 Federal Court of Appeal decision that overturned the deportation of his client, Leon Mugesera, and his family. Mugesera allegedly committed hate crimes in his native Rwanda. The Supreme Court will hear Bertrand's motion Dec. 8, the day the appeal is to begin.

Bertrand charges that Cotler and the "powerful, rich and influential" CJC, which is an intervenor in the case, plotted to get Abella on the high court because all three have a common interest in seeing Mugesera out of the country. Bertrand also faults Cotler for not disclosing his ties to CJC, as well as his friendship with Abella and her husband Irving, to the parliamentary committee that reviewed Abella's nomination. Cotler and Irving Abella are both past presidents of CJC.

In his submission, Bertrand claims that, before holding their current posts, both Cotler and Rosalie Abella participated in public events where Mugesera was denounced. Congress has also urged Ottawa to appeal the Federal Court's ruling that the government had not proved the hate crime allegations against Mugesera.

Mugesera allegedly incited racial hatred and genocide against Rwanda's Tutsi minority in a 1992 speech in that country. He has been living in Quebec for 10 years.

In its brief to the Supreme Court, the Justice Department says Bertrand's allegations of a "vast plot" are "absurd, even shocking."

Within seconds, a terrorist strike in Jerusalem can cause devastating losses and massive injuries. Within minutes, victims arrive at the Shaare Zedek Medical Center. York U investigating CUPE rally

By FRANCES KRAFT
and ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporters

York University is currently investigating a rally "in defence of campus democracy," organized last week by the Stewards' Council of CUPE 3903.

The rally, which attracted approximately 200 people, began in the Vari Hall rotunda and then moved to the doors of York University president Lorna Marsden's office.

In an open letter to Marsden, CUPE 3903 demanded, among other things, that Marsden's "administration cease punishing students for exercising their rights to free speech, assembly in public halls and political engagement, as well as publicly apologize to York University professor David Noble for accusing him of anti-Semitism."

In a joint statement issued last month by York University, Hillel and Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR), Noble was accused of handing out offensive research material at a film presentation sponsored by SPHR. The joint statement denounced the research titled "The York University Foundation: The Tail That Wags the Dog," and stated that the material handed out by Noble targeted "Jewish members of the York community."

Noble, who spoke at last week's rally, said, "We are declaring administrative policy on temporary use of space null and void.

"We will speak when and where we want, assemble when and where we want," he said to loud applause.

Noble went on to encourage the audience to look around the room at the surveillance cameras.

"A place where there's free speech and freedom of assembly is the safest place in the world. I urge the administration to remove it [the camera] before someone removes it for them," Noble said.

York University political science professor David McNally, who also spoke at the rally, said that "those who constitute the political elite and economic power have never liked democracy. We would go to sleep; they would amass wealth and power without restraint and without accountability.

"We'll be following up on [last week's] events," said York University spokesperson, Richard Fisher.

"Vari Hall is not an appropriate place for a rally. We're all members of a community and don't have the right to stop people from going about their classes," Fisher said.

In the meantime, in an apparent flip-flop of their earlier statement denouncing the material handed out by Noble, SPHR issued a new statement which says its members "emphatically support Prof. Noble and other like-minded and open-minded professors who individually and collectively elicit critical thought from students on campuses everywhere."

The statement went on to say that "the administration's attempt to bully individuals that stand in support of Palestinian human rights was again made clear in its dealings with two of SPHR's spokespersons. The administration asked SPHR to condemn allegedly 'anti-Semitic' material that was neither provided to the spokespersons nor distributed by SPHR or its members. The material was distributed by Prof. Noble in his own capacity, and SPHR reaffirms his right to do so."

Hillel@York was deeply disappointed to learn that SPHR@York has recanted its initial condemnation of Noble's targeting of Jewish members of the York University Foundation.

"Sadly, this is another attempt by SPHR to further polarize our campus and raise tensions between student groups," said Dori Borshiov, president of Hillel@York.

SPHR@York did not return The CJN's calls.

'Do the write thing' program raises awareness

By JONAH BROTMAN
Special to The CJN

Despite the predominance of middle-aged journalists in the Jewish media, a new wave of young Jewish journalists is now emerging. With programs such as "Do The Write Thing", which ran concurrently with the General Assembly of United Jewish Communities in Cleveland from Nov. 12-16, young Jewish journalists are quickly learning how to combine their love for the state of Israel with the love of journalism.

"Do The Write Thing" is an annual program for Jewish student journalists from campuses across North America. Sponsored by the Jewish Agency, the World Zionist Organization and the campus-oriented USD/Hagshama, the program helps young journalists such as myself, realize the importance of the Jewish media and our role in it.

Through panel discussions, interactive sessions and even a press conference with Israeli foreign minister and deputy Prime Minister Silvan Shalom, our group of Jewish student journalists developed a new understanding of media in general and how Judaism applies to the profession.

University of Toronto law student Sheryl Saperia agreed.

"Even though I'm not studying journalism, I really learned a lot about the field and how to be an effective Jewish journalist, and because of this program, I have become a lot more interested in journalism in general," she said. "Because the group [of students] was small, we were all able to have close contact with leading journalists in the Jewish world and that was really exciting."

> 'The field of journalism and the future of Judaism needs you'

Orna Hollander, Canadian regional director of USD/Hagshama, said, "I thought that all the students benefited a lot from this weekend's conference," she said. "I really hope that all the students will take the information they learned to their campuses and hopefully, throughout their lives."

The aspect of the program that I found most exciting was the opportunity to be an actual journalist. Each day, participants in the program were assigned to cover sessions of the GA and write an article summarizing the event. This provided me with a chance to interview key personalities on the panels and to experience the true feeling of journalism.

In its 15 years of existence, "Do The Write Thing" has helped hundreds, if not thousands, of Jewish student journalists realize their potential. In my case, the overall message of the entire weekend culminated with one statement. Noted Jewish journalist Neil Rubin, senior editor of the Baltimore Jewish Times, said that, "the field of journalism and the future of Judaism needs you." This blunt message perfectly summarizes the inspirational nature of the "Do The Write Thing" program.

"Do The Write Thing" was a complete success in both the minds of the participants and the organizers this year. Next year, the General Assembly and "Do The Write Thing" will be coming north to Toronto. Hopefully, more Canadian student journalists can attend because the experience is enlightening, empowering and incredibly important for the future of the Jewish people.

Is religion killing Judaism?

Rabbi Michael Skobac,
Educational Director and Senior Counselor of Jews for Judaism

This revealing presentation examines some of the negative stereotypes that people have about religion and how Judaism suffers by association.

Songwriter is remembered for I'll Never Smile Again

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Many Canadians do not know that one of the world's greatest pop songs of all time, I'll Never Smile Again, was written by a Canadian, Ruth Lowe, more than 60 years ago.

Although the song has been recorded by famous orchestras and well-known vocalists, it was not until recently that attention was once again focused on the composer. The original, four-page, hand-written manuscript turned up in Winnipeg and was returned to Lowe's son, Toronto photographer Tom Sandler.

"Although she won a Grammy Award and her music was

Songwriter Ruth Lowe

No. 1 for months, and is still heard regularly, I think she has never been recognized properly in her own country," says Sandler.

"She was a pioneer in the music industry, worked with many of the greats and has produced something that lives on."

Lowe wrote I'll Never Smile Again in 1939, to express her grief after the death of her first husband, music publicist Harold Cohen, at the age of 29. She had given the original manuscript to her friend Vida Guthrie, who was the musical arranger for orchestra leader Percy Faith.

Guthrie died in 1990, and the music sheets went to her daughter, Jane Morton, who lives in Winnipeg. Morton did not know what to do with the manuscript.

This summer, Morton received a call from a friend who told her that the History Channel was going to show a documentary biography on Lowe, who died in 1981 at 66. After she saw Lowe's son, Tom, on the program, she got his e-mail address and sent him a note telling him that she had his mother's original manuscript.

Sandler says he was overwhelmed and spent no time making the decision to fly to Winnipeg to get the manuscript. "It was very exciting. I think my mom would be the most excited and the happiest for me right now. Her dream would be complete – happy children. That was her real priority in life, even more than her music."

Ruth, whose father Sam Lowe was a struggling grocer in Toronto, moved his family to Los Angeles when she was a child. Her father died soon after they returned to Toronto. As a teenager, she went to work at the Song Shop on Yonge Street, playing songs on the piano for people who were buying sheet music.

At the store, Lowe heard that the famous all-female Ina Rae Hutton Orchestra needed a piano replacement for one night. She got the job and so impressed Hutton that she toured the United States with the orchestra.

Lowe met and married Cohen, and they lived in Chicago until he died of a kidney ailment in 1939. The 24-year-old widow returned to Toronto broken-hearted and began writing songs and playing piano on CBC.

She also worked with Percy Faith. To a reporter, she once said, "One day, Percy walked into the studio and heard me playing this song [I'll Never Smile Again]. He thought it was lovely and asked if he could play it on his show. He later recorded it."

Several months later, when Tommy Dorsey performed at the Canadian National Exhibition, someone gave him Percy Faith's recording of the song.

Dorsey recorded I'll Never Smile Again, featuring a young vocalist, Frank Sinatra, and the Pied Pipers. It became the biggest hit song of 1940 and was No. 1 on the first Billboard magazine chart. Other bands, including Glenn Miller's and Count Basie's, recorded the song and included it in their repertoire.

Sandler says although the song "wasn't about the Second World War, it caught the emotion of the time."

Lowe moved to New York, where she met many great performers. When Sinatra left the Dorsey band, he asked Lowe to write a theme song for him. She wrote the lyrics for Put Your Dreams Away, which was Sinatra's theme song for more than a quarter of a century.

In 1943, Lowe returned to Toronto, where she married Nat Sandler, a stockbroker. They had two sons, Stephen and Tom. Her life changed, as she became a well-to-do wife and mother. Although she continued writing songs, it was difficult to make the rounds to music publishers.

Tom says he remembers the many famous musicians who would come to their home when they played in Toronto. In 1954, his mother was tricked into visiting Los Angeles and to her utter surprise, after being out of the limelight for a decade, she heard host Ralph Edwards say, on the television show of the same name, "This is your life, Ruth Lowe."

In 1982, I'll Never Smile Again was inducted into the Grammy Hall of Fame. Now, more than half a century after it was written, I'll Never Smile Again is still being recorded by some of the world's most renowned musicians.

Sandler is working on a book about his mother's life. "She left a great deal of memorabilia from famous performers and composers, as well as old records and clippings," he says. "I think it will make a fabulous history."

Would Abbas be a big improvement over Arafat?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Are Palestinians rallying behind Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen), an interim leader and the leading candidate for Palestinian Authority president?

Matthew Fisher reported in the National Post ("Powell takes olive branch to Mideast," Nov. 23) that a recent Palestinian university poll found that 24 per cent of voters supported Abbas. This is a huge increase from the three per cent popular support that Abbas garnered before Yasser Arafat's death.

In a Nov. 23 telephone call, Danny Rubenstein, an Israeli journalist, author and expert on the Palestinians, explained that the difference in these figures merely reflects the fact Abbas is the only Fatah candidate for PA president. He still has a very limited following on the Palestinian street, according to Rubinstein, who predicted a power struggle in the months ahead.

Fisher wrote that Abbas "has denounced violence as a way for Palestinians to achieve statehood and is perceived as a moderate."

But Rubinstein has written ("Lost in transition," Ha'aretz, Nov. 15) that Abbas is not as moderate as some believe: "Many of the hopes that have been pinned on Abu Mazen in the past few weeks stem from a basic mistake – namely the assumption that because his [non-bellicose] style, like his character and his lifestyle, differ from Arafat's, he will also espouse political views that are more convenient for a settlement. But this is not the case. On political positions, there is no difference between Abu Mazen and Arafat."

Abbas' insistence on the "right of return" to Israel, as reported by Associated Press ("Abbas kicks off campaign for president with hard line toward Israel," by reporter Mohammed Daraghmeh, Nov. 24) lends support to Rubinstein's analysis.

Rubenstein is on the political left and shares the majority view among Israelis that favours the creation of a Palestinian state if the Palestinians are prepared to provide genuine peace and security. The signs so far are not encouraging.

The Mideast policy of the United States, particularly its alliance with Israel, is to blame for the hatred Osama bin Laden harbours towards the West. That's the thesis espoused by ex-CIA analyst and Osama bin Laden expert Mike Scheuer in his book Imperial Hubris.

Scheuer was interviewed by Neil MacDonald on CBC News: Sunday Night, Nov. 21. Said Scheuer: "The U.S. is occupying the holiest place on the Arabian peninsula, the second holiest place in Iraq and the Israelis [are] occupying Jerusalem."

MacDonald replied: "It is political heresy in Washington to draw a direct line between Osama bin Laden and Israel..."

Scheuer: "If you talk about Israel, you are labelled an anti-Semite and then that's the end of the discussion."

That reply may be the way that Scheuer avoids criticism. After all, Scheuer has spent more time emphasizing the United States' "unqualified support for Israel" as a major cause for bin Laden's actions than has bin Laden himself. Many in the American Jewish community fear that Scheuer is trying to get average Americans to blame Israel (and even some American Jews whom he refers to as "Israel's citizen-spies") for the Islamists' anti-Americanism (as editor Andrew Silow-Carroll has argued in the New Jersey Jewish News).

In a charming piece about a documentary series on Chinese restaurants around the world ("Those egg rolls tell a story," Globe and Mail, Nov. 20), Jan Wong mistakenly placed the Israeli city of Haifa in the West Bank. This is a sloppy but minor blunder compared to the series of errors in the Nov. 13 Globe feature by Stephanie Nolen headlined "Help Wanted."

Nolen, an editor of Palestine Report from 1996 to1997, was parachuted into the West Bank from Africa to cover Arafat's death for the Globe. Nolen wrote, erroneously, that in the Oslo accords, Israel pledged to freeze settlements.

She also wrote that there are "eight million Palestinian refugees." If so, nearly every Palestinian, including the 1.2 million Arab citizens of Israel, are refugees. UNRWA, the UN agency responsible for Palestinian refugees, puts the number at 4.1 million, about 46 per cent of Palestinians worldwide. Where Nolen came up with the figure of eight million is anyone's guess.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

'The focus should be on Israel's desire for peace'

Members of Jewish organizations who have contact with the public in their communities are being asked to "communicate to Canadians just why there is such a natural fit [with Israel]: shared democracy, high-tech development, assistance to third world countries," he said.

In the event of a terrorist outrage in Israel, "we don't have to go out and say Palestinian terrorists blew up the bus. That's understood. We don't want to press buttons to put them into the instinctive Canadian reaction of balancing and equalizing things out." The focus should be on Israel's desire for peace, Fogel said.

Shimon Fogel

The guide outlines seven "myths" that have underlined the Jewish community's understanding of the issues as well as its approach to pro-Israel advocacy. These have either not resonated with the Canadian public or have backfired, the guide states.

The myths, followed by the poll's findings, are:

• that the media is biased against Israel – the poll found more Canadians feel the media is unfair to Palestinians;

• that Palestinians are to blame for the violence – 89 per cent believe both Israelis and Palestinians share equal responsibility for the violence and must be equally responsible for peace steps;

• there is natural sympathy for Israel – Palestinians are viewed as the underdogs and those who say they are more familiar with the Mideast conflict are more likely to favour the Palestinian side;

• the government must be encouraged to be more favourable to Israel – Canadians want the government to remain neutral between the two sides; and

• Canadians are more supportive of Israel because of shared values – Canadians don't recognize shared values with Israel and only 42 per cent were aware that Israel is a democratic state. Similar percentages did not know Israelis enjoyed freedom of speech or religion.

One observer of the Jewish scene agreed it's time for a fresh start in promoting Israel's cause.

> 'The guide poses a challenge to grassroots activists'

"It's worth a shot," said Prof. Martin Lockshin, director of the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University in Toronto.

"The new ideas do not [involve] criticism that much but highlight the commonalities. This may be more effective," he said.

Lockshin agreed with the poll's findings that "the traditional approach has not been effective. The assumption most human beings have when they see both sides fighting is that both sides are wrong. People on the sidelines will say, a plague on both your houses."

Lockshin said he was particularly disappointed in the poll's finding that most Canadians don't recognize Israel as a fellow democracy. He said the assertions from radical left-wing circles that have slammed Israel repeatedly seem to have had an impact on public perceptions.

Lockshin said it's possible the kind of advocacy suggested in the guide – painting a positive image of Israel – will have a positive impact in universities.

Another academic, Gil Troy, a professor of history at McGill University, said the poll's findings seem to confirm "a kind of churlishness in the way Canadians approach" the Mideast conflict.

"Too many Canadians have taken a European perspective, not only on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, but on the war on terror in general. Once you decide you want to embrace the 'pox on both your houses' and 'cycle of violence' approach mindlessly advanced by the Liberal government, it's easier to believe that Israel is not a democracy, not civilized [like us].

"To acknowledge the complexity, to see the beauty and idealism of Israel, would require too much work, too much nuance, and few are willing to invest that kind of intellectual energy in studying the conflict," he said.

However, the guide's approach may be flawed. "Too much of this conversation has been top down and not bottom up," he said.

Furthermore, the strategy being touted "of niceness, of never making demands" may not work.

Not only will that approach not appeal to the Jewish organizations' base, but Troy said successful social/political movements – civil rights, feminism, Soviet Jewry – deployed anger and made demands effectively.

"A little bit of anger deployed strategically can be a good thing," he said.

The marketing type of approach advocated in the guide is "a little too European, too insider, passive, a little too concerned what they think of us," he added.

Fogel agrees the guide poses a challenge to grassroots activists. "They are being asked to take a step back. They are being called upon to undertake what does good as opposed to just what feels good," he said.

Document on Montreal Jewish life 120 years ago is translated for first time

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Only about 1,000 Jews made up the Montreal community 120 years ago, but there were some similarities with today's community.

It was marked by a flexible Orthodoxy, a Reform congregation that was treated with disdain by the Orthodox, and concerns over Jewish education and burgeoning anti-Semitism in Europe.

These intriguing glimpses are revealed in a recent, first-time translation of a remarkable document that first appeared in 1884 in a Russian-Hebrew periodical called ha-Melitz.

The author was Yosef Eliyahu Bernstein, described as a "relative newcomer to Montreal" and by himself as a "native of Poland."

Archivist Eiran Harris discovered the letter about two years ago while perusing old issues of ha-Melitz in the archives of the Jewish Public Library. He and student Don Charness presented it to Prof. Ira Robinson of the Concordia University religion department, saying its historic significance was apparent.

Robinson did the actual translation from the original Hebrew, and it reveals information never seen before, Harris said.

Previously, research scholars such as the late David Rome have made reference to the document, but it was never translated from its original Hebrew.

"There has never been an attempt to understand the article as a whole," Robinson writes in the forward to the translated document, which was recently published in booklet form by Concordia's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Robinson said the document vividly describes previously unknown details about Montreal Jewish life from that time, including perspectives on three synagogues and the efforts undertaken to create a new congregation.

This type of information, he suggested, read by Jews in eastern Europe and Russia, could conceivably have influenced a decision to immigrate to Canada.

"You have to remember, immigration from eastern Europe was just beginning, so we knew precious little about the nature of Montreal's Jewish community from that time," Robinson said. "There was no Jewish press yet in Montreal."

Robinson says Bernstein wrote in a "grandiloquent" Hebrew and not Yiddish, the lingua franca of eastern European Jews, as a reflection of contemporary Haskala (Enlightenment) attitudes "that was perfectly at home in a journal like ha-Melitz."

Bernstein begins with a warning for potential émigrés: "Be wary. Don't expect to escape anti-Semitism in the New World because it lurks everywhere…

"Set your minds to investigate and to thoroughly know the condition of your brethren in the lands of America, as well as in the rest of the world before you set out on your journey… Here, also, we are considered to be strangers and foreigners in a land not our own…

"Who could have told us that the infectious leprosy of anti-Semitism, while [apparently] already passed from the earth, should once again move the hearts of the nations to attack us?… Is the New World not similar to Russia?… Both here and there, we live among scorpions."

Despite this, Jewish Montreal as described by Bernstein is full of vitality. Within the last two years before the letter was written, 400 Russian-Jewish families had arrived.

"In this city, one finds synagogues, charitable societies, places for public meetings, ritual slaughterers and circumcisers. It has three synagogues for its [three] communities, which differ from one another in their customs and ways."

As Bernstein describes it, Montreal Jewry is divided into two "parties": the "Orthodox" and the "Reformers."

The first congregation is Shaar Hashomayim, which Bernstein portrays as moderate in its Orthodox practice and as being faithfully served by its leader, one H. Friedlander.

"Though he is a true Orthodox person," Bernstein writes, "he knows how to proceed according to the spirit of the times and the place, and in this, he satisfies the congregation."

The second is the Spanish and Portuguese, although Bernstein refers only to it being the "Portuguese" synagogue. According to Robinson, Bernstein's account of the congregation's origins is fanciful, and is apparently based on hearsay and Bernstein's puzzlement over the fact that its worshippers were of Spanish, Portuguese and local birth even though they used the "Portuguese" liturgy.

The third is the Temple Emanu-El, whose members the Orthodox community consider virtual heretics, according to Bernstein.

"The believers arose and made an outcry against their opinion," Bernstein writes. "They suffered the scorn of their opponents, like thorns and pricks." He adds that the temple's new leader, Samuel Marks, arrived "to take them away from their religion."

The fourth congregation Bernstein describes is the short-lived Gemilut Hasadim Shel Anshe Russia, a congregation of Russian Jews which Robinson said has its sole known mention in print in Bernstein's document.

It's a noteworthy account though, Robinson says, because it suggests that its congregants remained Russian patriots despite their homeland's mistreatment of Jews, and that the chassidic shul's not lasting long might have been a result of opposition to Chassidut at that time in Montreal.

The Chevra Kadisha society, which tends compassionately to the sick, dying, and dead, "stands as a sign and a glory," founded on "lovingkindness, mercy and general love of humanity."

At the same time, Bernstein's heart "shudders" at the quality of Jewish education, which is very bad. "The Reform do not even have a school to teach their sons Torah or faith."

As for the Orthodox, "the education… is no better than the previous case because it fails to plant in the hearts of the youth the love of the faith and religion of the Israelites."

For the children of the poor, it is even "worse and more bitter," learning only when their exhausted fathers return from work and rouse them from sleep.

"If only my words would penetrate the ears of the people who have the ability to correct that which is wrong, most of whom are prosperous and could, without a single thought, spend an adequate amount in the establishment of a talmud Torah… and take care of the children…"

Throughout the document, Bernstein writes with eloquence, perceptively and with heartfelt concern, as an honest witness, embracing and describing in good detail the positive aspects of Montreal Jewish life, yet never through rose-coloured glasses.

Hatzolah volunteers respond to emergencies in Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Somewhere between Magen David Adom (MDA), Israel's national emergency service, and Zaka, the organization that cleans up after terror attacks, is a little-known entity that has quickly become a key component of Israel's emergency services network.

Meira Rice Golbert

Hatzolah Israel is an all-volunteer emergency response agency that became national in scope during the summer. Consisting of approximately 1,000 volunteers scattered across the country, it's responsible for responding to some 80 per cent of the emergency calls in Israel.

That amounts to 200 to 250 per day, said Meira Rice Golbert, Hatzolah's director of development who was in Toronto recently to raise funds and awareness for the organization.

Hatzolah was created 21 years ago in Jerusalem after a number of Israelis witnessed an emergency and saw the victim die while waiting for ambulances to arrive. They saw the need for a quicker response time than the seven to 10 minutes provided by MDA, Rice Golbert said.

The organization works with MDA to respond quickly to emergencies. It is hooked into MDA's emergency call system and its members are trained by MDA personnel. Whether it's aiding victims of terror attacks, or answering more routine calls such as delivering babies, its volunteers are on average only 72 seconds away from an emergency situation, she said.

The first two to four minutes in an emergency is often the most critical period and Hatzolah plays a key role in providing life-saving treatment, she said. About 80 per cent of all calls to MDA result in a Hatzolah volunteer appearing on the scene first, she added.

Hatzolah receives no government funding. It's $1.4-million (US) budget is supported exclusively by contributions from supporters in the Diaspora (60 per cent) and Israel (40 per cent), as well as a $120 (US) fee charged to all volunteers.

> 'When they hear our story, people will want to get involved, because they will be part of saving lives on a daily basis'

Because its volunteers are dispersed throughout the country – 600 live in the Jerusalem area, 400 in other centres – they can get to emergency scenes quickly, Rice Golbert said.

The volunteers, who come from all walks of life, are on call 24/7 and are equipped with portable medical kits, beepers and two-way radios. Recognizable from their distinctive orange vests and trademark "AmbuCycle" scooters with a specially equipped box to carry their gear, they can manoeuvre through traffic jams and terrorist scenes to provide first aid.

Rice Golbert is fond of telling a couple of amazing stories about the organization's ability to respond quickly.

The first took place in Beth Shemesh, a community about a 30-minute drive west of Jerusalem. A mother had left her 11-month-old daughter alone for a moment while she answered a phone call and in that span, the girl swallowed a small rubber ball and was turning blue. The frantic mother placed the emergency call to MDA and within 15 seconds of the dispatcher announcing the emergency, volunteer Michael Kaplan was at the apartment.

By chance, Kaplan lived two buildings away and as soon as he saw the address and situation on his pager, he was out the door and at the family's home. He removed the ball and administered oxygen. By the time the ambulance crew arrived, the girl was breathing normally.

A second incident took place earlier this year on a bus on Rechov Yam Suf in the Sanhedria district of Jerusalem. A 70-year-old man had suffered a heart attack and the emergency call went out. Within two minutes, three volunteers were there to administer CPR and employ a defibrillator. On the fifth shock, the victim's pulse returned and 24 hours later he was up on his own in the hospital.

Rice Golbert, a native of Houston, Texas, recently visited communities in North America to inform people about Hatzolah and encourage charitable contributions to the organization.

"When they hear our story, people will want to get involved, because they will be part of saving lives on a daily basis," she said.

OneFamily Fund dedicated to aiding terror victims

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL—Their stories are as different as they are the same:

Dr. Shmuel Yarfost of Afula will probably never operate again after being critically injured in a terrorist attack in May, 2003.

Ora Regev's son, Eli, died just over a year ago at the bombing of the Maxim restaurant in Haifa.

For Yarfost, 48, and Regev's mother, life will never be the same, they told a recent State of Israel Bonds evening in support of the OneFamily Fund, an organization that provides moral and material support for victims of terror and their families in Israel.

Clutching a photo of her late son, Regev swallowed her tears as she recounted the chronicle of her shattered life that the OneFamily Fund has sought to rebuild, little by little and day by day.

"It's very hard for a mother to talk about a son," Regev told the gathering at the Beth Zion Congregation, the photo resting for all to see atop the rostrum. "It's very hard to talk in the past tense."

Yet Regev did so, as part of the OneFamily Fund's efforts to build support in the Diaspora.

Regev answered, "anytime, anywhere," when invited by the fund to speak as a part of a North American tour.

Regev and Afula were joined in Montreal by other victims and families: Rina Ish-Ran, whose son Yosef, 14, and his friend, were found in a wadi cave over three years ago; and Alona Yom Tov, an Israeli critically wounded in the attack of the Paradise Hotel in Monbasa, Kenya, two years ago.

All in all, over 1,000 Israelis have died at the hands of terrorists and almost 6,300 have been wounded since the latest intifadah began in the fall of 2000.

For one of the fund's chief's spokespeople, Shannon Shibata, the equation to help is a simple one, but the road there has been arduous.

Shibata's voice was filled with emotion as she recounted her own transformation from a naive non-Jewish student at Hebrew University, who witnessed what terrorism wreaked. She could just not fathom doing nothing about it for the simple reason that she "had no choice."

> OneFamily's hallmark is the 'knowledge that people in the Diaspora care... It is helping victims become survivors'

At only 24, Shibata is incredulous that people can still see the targeting of innocent civilians as a "Jewish problem," as she admits she herself once did.

Shibata's Japanese-born father, who she said was once "the biggest anti-Semite in the world," shunned her when she told him she planned to live in Israel and help victims of terror. That is, she said, until he eventually enlightened himself.

Shibata has seen it all. She stayed with families in hospitals as they waited to see whether their sons and daughters were dead or alive. She was the non-Jew who people looked at strangely when they learned what she wanted to do.

Be assured, she exhorted the audience, that "there are gentiles who will stand with you, because you matter.

"You changed people like me because you matter," she said. "What else could I do?"

Shibata pointed out that the OneFamily Fund had its start shortly after 9/11, as a result of the efforts of the Belzberg family, of Vancouver.

Marc and Chantal Belzberg, who now live in Israel, at the specific request of their daughter, used the proceeds from her bat mitzvah to help victims of the Sbarro Pizzeria suicide bombing in August 2001.

The Belzbergs now preside over the fund, which has thrived as a grassroots organization and contributed over $10 million (US) towards the rehabilitation and recovery of terrorist victims and their families. Local Montrealers instrumental in getting OneFamily active in Montreal have included Ariela Cotler and Brenda Gewurtz.

OneFamily Fund programs offer financial and material aid through an orphan's fund; human support in the form of retreats, support groups and workshops; emotional rebuilding through Adopt-A-Family; and helping families celebrate the Jewish holidays, the most difficult times of the year for victims of terror.

For Pam Albert, OneFamily's national director in Toronto, OneFamily's hallmark is the "knowledge that people in the Diaspora care... It is helping victims become survivors," she said.

Other speakers at the event included Israel Bonds' Rena Bassal and Ora Stolovitz; Jewish students who have raised money for OneFamily; the Beth Zion's Eleanor Wiseman and Rabbi Sidney Shoham; and Israeli consul-general Marc Attali, who spoke of the need for Israelis and Jews everywhere to do everything in their power to support terror victims whose lives have been marked by "bravery, loss and determination."

London Jew angry at MP O'Brien

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A member of the London Jewish community is angry that a letter accusing him of fabricating details of a meeting with local Liberal MP Patrick O'Brien ended up on the bulletin board of the city's largest mosque.

Jacob Peretz believes O'Brien and the mosque acted inappropriately in prominently displaying the letter where an extremist could have seen it. Peretz said he felt uncomfortable and had concerns for his safety after three unnamed friends told him about the letter, which contained his full address. Peretz subsequently received a photograph of the letter on the bulletin board.

"It's not very pleasant to have your name in a mosque… If a radical saw it, that's what I'm concerned [about]. I don't want any harm done to me or my family."

The letter that appeared over the summer in the London Muslim Mosque was written by O'Brien in response to a story that appeared in the March 11, 2004 edition of The CJN. The article described a meeting involving the London-Fanshawe MP and members of the local Jewish community that took place after O'Brien suggested Israel's West Bank security barrier was placing Palestinians inside a giant concentration camp.

The CJN reported that O'Brien told Peretz and the other community representatives that his Muslim constituents had brought the issue to his attention and asked him to make a statement about it. That version of events was backed up by Leo Adler, Canadian spokesperson for the Simon Wiesenthal Center, who also attended the meeting.

But O'Brien denied he was influenced by Muslim constituents. In the letter to Peretz that appeared in the mosque, he stated, "The simple truth is that not one of my constituents… asked me to comment on the wall.

"Your inaccurate portrayal of my remarks is just the latest in a series of fabrications about my statements regarding this issue."

Unbeknownst to Peretz, a copy of the letter was also sent to Mohammad Yassine, the current treasurer of the London-Fanshawe Liberal riding association. Peretz believes Yassine at the time was also a member of the mosque's executive and provided the letter to the mosque to boost O'Brien's election campaign.

"There was no reason for them to have a letter to me with my address from my MP," Peretz said.

Contacted by phone in London, Yassine said, "I'm not aware of the letter you're referring to," and added, "I have no idea what Jacob [Peretz] or Mr. Adler is complaining about."

Adler said that by forwarding a copy of the letter to Yassine and by declining his proposal for a joint Jewish/Muslim program during Holocaust Education Week to discuss the issue, O'Brien was attempting to divide Canadian Jews and Muslims.

> 'Instead, you chose to tell us one thing while telling your Muslim voters something else'

"The way [the letter] was worded, it appeared he was standing up to this powerful lobby group [the London Jews]," Adler said.

Writing to O'Brien, Adler complained that the mosque's congregation saw only a small part of the give and take between O'Brien and the Jewish community.

In addition, there was no reason O'Brien couldn't acknowledge that his Muslim constituents asked him to speak out on the security barrier, which is their right as Canadians, the letter stated.

"Instead, you chose to tell us one thing while telling your Muslim voters something else, and you chose to divide one group of Canadians from another, rather than uniting them, and you chose to hide and obfuscate, rather than clarify and be clear and transparent," Adler's letter stated.

O'Brien did not return The CJN's call.

Embassies team up to celebrate Sephardi Jewry

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A unique partnership within this city's diplomatic community recently showcased the cultural heritage of Sephardi Jews.

The Israeli Embassy was joined by the embassies of Spain, Turkey and Greece – all Mediterranean countries with rich Jewish heritages – as co-hosts of a series of events under the banner "A Mediterranean Odyssey: Sephardi Culture Week in Ottawa."

Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker welcomed the large audience to the opening concert, held Nov. 14 at the Canadian Museum of Civilization.

"To have the embassies of Israel, Greece, Spain and Turkey work together in such a harmonious way for such a special reason this week is making history and can serve as an example," Baker said.

The concert featured classical guitarist Daniel Bolshoy, who played pieces that were written or influenced by Sephardi traditions. Cantor Daniel Benlolo, just back from leading a tour to his native Morocco, sang in Ladino and was joined for a special duet by singer Floralove Katz.

Each embassy sponsored an event during the week.

On Nov. 15, Turkey presented a lecture by Naim Guleryuz, founder and curator of Istanbul's Jewish Museum.

Israel hosted a performance by Solly Levy from Toronto, who told stories at the National Arts Centre.

Spain presented a lecture by Prof. Rosa Asenjo of the University of Montreal and a documentary about the Sephardi quarters in Spain.

On Nov. 18, Greece held an event at the Ottawa Hellenic Centre that featured Greek music and dancing, as well as a lecture by David Bensoussan, president of the Communauté Sépharade Unifiée du Québec, titled, "Marriage a Mogador Maroc."

Congregation Beth Shalom concluded the Sephardi Culture Week with a Kabalat Shabbat and dinner. During services in the synagogue, Cantor Benlolo chanted in the Sephardi tradition, setting the tone for the evening.

Guest lecturer Rabbi Yamin Levi of Yeshiva University spoke about Maimonides, the 13th century physician and philosopher, on the 800th anniversary of Maimonides' death, which is being marked this year.

Ronen Gil-Or, deputy head of mission at the Israeli Embassy, said he spent many enjoyable hours on the event's organizing committee.

"The deputies who worked on the project… became friends and enjoyed working and being together. Benlolo's voice and his expertise added a lot as well," he said.

"It was unique for the diplomatic corps to see this kind of celebration and co-operation between embassies on a cultural topic," he said. "For us at the embassy, it was so interesting to see how much this subject captured the attention and interest of all of these embassies."

Nearly 1,500 people participated in the various events, Gil-Or said.

"Our mandate is to do cultural events also outside of the Jewish community," he said.

Marriage contracts and cohabitation agreements: necessary or not?

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Partner, Beard Winter LLP

Let's take a little journey down Ontario homestead lane and examine two types of living arrangements: marriages and "just living together".

In the storybook first-time marriage of young people with little money, the couple uses their wedding gift (money or joint savings) for a down payment and buys their first home in joint names. They take out a conventional mortgage together. If they ever separate, then they divide the equity between them.

This is straightforward and fair. But in our increasingly complicated world of serial families and successive marriages, life is not so simple. It is not unusual for a divorced person — or a single person who already owns a home — to marry or move in with their bashert.

When fairy-tale beginnings meet real-life endings

Let's call our male protagonist Mr. Harold Schlemiel, and let's say that his home is worth $500,000 on the date of his marriage, with a $120,000 mortgage. Without signing a marriage contract, he marries Miss Matilda Kvetch. After five years Miss Kvetch leaves Mr. Schlemiel because he snores too much, at which point the home is now worth $800,000.

Let's assume that neither spouse has any other assets or debts on the date they married nor on the date they separated. During five years of marriage, Kvetch has never contributed anything to paying down the mortgage or improving the home, either directly or indirectly. Since the marriage has lasted for more than five years, and since the spouses failed to sign a marriage contract to exclude the marriage date value of the home from any division, Kvetch is still automatically entitled to half the home's entire value. This value equals $400,000 minus the mortgage. She is even entitled to one half of that part of the equity that existed prior to their marriage, namely half of $500,000, i.e. $250,000.

If Kvetch left Schlemiel before the fifth wedding anniversary she may still be entitled to half, but the shorter the marriage, the less likely she would be so entitled. In addition, even though they were married for less than five years, Schlemiel would still have to prove that there was something about splitting the value of their assets that would be not merely unfair but "unconscionable", which is a very high legal test. So obviously there is a very important need for someone in Schlemiel's position to have a marriage contract signed before getting married.

In the marriage contract the couple could agree, at the very least, to exclude the possibility of Kvetch sharing in the premarriage value of the marital home in the event the couple separates or Schlemiel dies. Other clients in similar situations simply exclude the entire value of the home (including any future increase in value of that home) and refuse to share any of it with their new spouse. This is especially true if the home is completely paid for, such as inherited property or property that has been gifted to the couple. In other situations, much depends on whether a mortgage still has to be paid and whether the spouses are going to be paying it jointly. If so, they often decide that at the very least they will share the future increase in value of the property.

Validity of marriage contract hinges on full financial disclosure

Whatever the decision, for the marriage contract to be valid, the spouses require reciprocal full financial disclosure and independent legal advice before signing such an agreement.

If the entire house is a gift from wealthy parents, and the non-propertied spouse objects to signing a marriage contract, such parents will sometimes place the home in the name of their newly married son or daughter and then take back a non-interest-bearing mortgage for almost the entire purchase price of the home. The parents who are giving the money for the purchase of the home then wait several years until they are convinced that this new marriage is on "solid ground" before signing a release of the mortgage, at which point the equity in the home is then open to division if the parties ever separate.

What if Schlemiel had a $200,000 mortgage and was not getting married but was moving in with someone? Let's assume that his new "common law" wife, named Miss Balabusta, cooks, raises the children, cleans the house, works outside the home, contributes monthly to the mortgage and helps pay for repairs to the home on a regular basis. However, the couple fails to sign a "cohabitation agreement" before moving in with each other. After five years of cohabitation, Balabusta decides that Schlemiel's feet smell and leaves him.

As in the previous example, the house has gone up in value to $800,000 from $500,000 when they first began to cohabit. Unlike a married woman, Balabusta has no automatic rights to a legal interest in Schlemiel's home. She also gains no rights to the home in spite of having raised the children and having toiled so admirably.

However, because Balabusta contributed monthly to the mortgage, cleaned the house and paid regularly for repairs, she may have some claim against the property. She could negotiate or sue for a percentage interest in the home, and this percentage could go as high as 50%, depending on how many years she lived in the house and how much money she actually contributed.

"Constructive trust": protecting the rights of the at-risk spouse

Under Ontario law, Balabusta becomes a beneficiary of something called a "constructive trust". If Schlemiel doesn't reimburse Balabusta for her rightful "equitable interest" in the home, then under laws made by the Judges of Ontario, it could be said that Schlemiel was "unjustifiably enriched" by Balabusta's physical efforts and financial contributions. A Court will award her a percentage to match her direct or indirect input. Even if she had contributed only physical effort (though housecleaning, gardening, home repairs and so on) and not money, the Courts have often granted unmarried "spouses" some percentage interest.

However, unlike with married couples these rights don't come automatically. It can cost both spouses tens of thousands of dollars to litigate until the Courts determine what percentage is appropriate. It's obviously a great deal cheaper to (hopefully) avoid costly Court proceedings by signing a cohabitation agreement where partners determine who gets how much, if anything and at what percentage. Romantic? Not by most people's definition. Practical? Absolutely.

Now let's say Schlemiel not only wants a marriage contract to limit his wife's financial interest in the matrimonial home, but he also wants the agreement to compel her to leave their home on 30 days' written notice. However, Section 52(2) of Ontario's Family Law Act specifically renders unenforceable any agreements whereby a spouse can be forced out of the matrimonial home. At the end of a marriage, the only way Schlemiel can get his wife out of the home is by mutual agreement or by the order of a Court.

Getting it right (in writing) the first time: when palatability meets practicality

Surprisingly, no such protection exists if Schlemiel signs a "cohabitation agreement" with Miss Balabusta, unless they get married at some point during their cohabitation. Otherwise, since the couple isn't married, the partners could theoretically agree in a cohabitation agreement that Miss Balabusta must leave on notice, written or otherwise, no matter how long she and Schlemiel have lived together. Nothing in law protects Balabusta once she's signed such an agreement.

Conclusion: if you're about to get "joined at the hip" and already own a home or about to buy one, do some planning and get it in writing.

From the firm of Beard Winter LLP and from all the members of my family, I wish you a freylich Chanukah.

JIAS plans commemorative cookbook

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jewish Immigrant Services of Canada is seeking submissions for its newest project, a commemorative cookbook that will follow the various waves of Jewish immigration to Canada since JIAS first opened its doors in 1922.

The book will include family recipes along with a story about the donor, including, perhaps, what life was like in their previous country, what food they enjoyed every day or at holiday times, or what memories they have of these foods.

It will also include some background on each immigrant's new life in Canada.

Mila Voihanski, JIAS executive director, said that it is an exciting project "that is long overdue. It will raise awareness of JIAS, and it will [portray] a positive image of immigrants."

Barbara Held, JIAS executive assistant, said "The book will also reiterate that at one point every Jew was an immigrant or the child of immigrants.

"It is important to remember who we are and where we come from. The book will touch its readers because everyone has their own memories, and many of these memories revolve around food. We thought this would be a great way to go down memory lane."

The strong connection between family memories and food hit home for Voihanski on the High Holy Days, she said, after she attempted to create a low-fat holiday dinner.

"My son said that the meal was not just about eating the food, but about the feelings the food evokes. Without the brisket and chopped liver, it was not a traditional holiday meal, he said.

"That is the last time I will change our holiday menu," said Voihanski.

Held said she has a secret family recipe for gottespeise, a type of cake that is handed down to daughters on their wedding day. "It started with my grandmother, and it was given to me on my wedding day. That is the type of recipe and story we are looking for."

Flyers about the project have been sent out across the country, said Held, because JIAS has helped people everywhere in Canada.

> 'It is a way to tell our stories to our children, and pass down traditions'

The book committee, made up of people from a variety of backgrounds including India, China, Russia, Ukraine, England, South Africa, Argentina and Morocco, will collect recipes and stories, interview people who do not want to write their own story, sort through pictures, and test all prospective recipes, said Voihanski.

Cookbook author and chef Norene Gilletz is their food consultant.

"We could feel the excitement about the project at our first committee meeting. It is a way to tell our stories to our children, and pass down traditions," said Voihanski.

For information on volunteering on the committee, or to share a recipe and story write JIAS Canada, 4580 Dufferin St., Suite 306, Toronto, M3H 5Y2; call 416-630-9051, ext. 33; fax 416-630-9029; or e-mail national@jias.org.

Chanukah Food Ideas

Recipes children can make on their own

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

If you are looking for amazing recipes your children can really make then get them a copy of Kitchen for Kids by Jennifer Low (Whitecap). Low, a busy mother of two young children, is the food editor of House & Home magazine.

Kitchen for Kids contains more than 100 easy, yummy recipes that let children work safely in the kitchen (no sharp knives, no stove-top cooking). The instructions are detailed but not overwhelming. Every recipe has been successfully tested by kids aged four to 11, helping them discover the thrill of cooking from scratch.

The fabulous photos by talented Mark Burstyn are excellent. This delightful kid-friendly cookbook is ideal for Chanukah gift-giving. Without a doubt, the kids will use it all-year round!

There are lots of recipes for sweets such as cakes, cookies and desserts – isn't that the most direct path to a child's heart? Who wouldn't love Gooshy S'More Cakes, Sweet Snowflakes or Alphabet Cookies? There are also tempting recipes for Big Soft Pretzels, Peek-a-Boo Meatloaf and Noisy French Toast.

Cindy Beer, a busy Thornhill mom, always meant to get her kids involved in cooking, but somehow it just never happened. I decided it was time for Cindy to start "kidding around" in the kitchen! I handed her a copy of Kitchen for Kids and told her to let Daniel, almost 10, and Shoshana, 6, pick several recipes they would like to make. The kids made "a whole bunch" of choices, then Cindy pared down the list and helped them choose two recipes.

Daniel and Shoshana decided on Chocolate-Mint Pinwheel Lollies. They loved the picture of the cookies, so their choice was easy! Cindy was determined to include a healthy main dish, so she chose Tuna Fish Patties, since they're baked, not fried.

Cindy put all the ingredients out on the kitchen table, as the kids helped her. Cindy lined the baking pan for them and softened the butter in the microwave. The kids measured out the sugar and added it to the bowl. They mixed the butter mixture, with a little help from Mom. Daniel broke the egg and added it. He carefully measured each ingredient, then Shoshana added it to the bowl.

Mixing was a bit difficult, so the kids used their hands. They loved squishing the dough! They dropped the blobs of dough and flattened them with their knuckles, with Mom guiding them. Mom started rolling the dough into a cylinder and the kids finished it up. Daniel cut the cookies, under Mom's nervous eyes.

Kids take over the kitchen

It was hard for Cindy to let them do things on their own. She was worried about them getting egg shells in the batter and making a mess, but she decided to relax and let them do their thing. The kids inserted the popsicle sticks, then waited with bated breath for the cookies to be ready. They were slightly browner than they might have been, but that was Mom's fault – she didn't check them soon enough!

"Daniel and Shoshana did an A-1 job!" says Cindy.

Conclusion: "We'll make these again, but next time we'll omit the peppermint extract and replace it with extra vanilla extract." (Daniel decided he doesn't like mint, but Shoshana does.)

Shoshana helped Cindy make the tuna patties and it was a good learning experience. There wasn't any onion salt, so they added a little extra salt. Cindy forgot to buy dried dill, so they omitted it. They didn't have saltine-type crackers, so they crushed up some croutons together, then added a little extra matzah meal to make up the difference. Shoshana mixed up the tuna mixture, then shaped and coated the patties with cereal and put them on the baking sheet. They came out delicious and crunchy!

Conclusion: These would make a good choice for Chanukah. Everyone ate them. The adults enjoyed them and the kids ate them up, although Shoshana prefers plain tuna right out of the can.

"Next time we'll try them with salmon," Cindy says.

Put the kids to work cooking

Line the square pan with plastic wrap and lots of overhang. Line a baking sheet with parchment paper.

To make the butter mixture, in a large bowl, use a baking spatula or wooden spoon to cream the butter and sugar. Add the egg, corn syrup, baking soda and salt. Mix well.

To make the mint dough, measure out ½ cup plus ⅓ cup of butter mixture into another large bowl and add a drop of green food colouring to it so you won't have a mix-up. (Don't mix up the two bowls of butter mixture because they are different amounts.) Set aside.

To make the chocolate dough, use the butter mixture in the bowl that does not have the food colouring. Add the vanilla and cocoa powder. Mix well. Gradually stir in 1⅔ cups flour. When the dough gets too stiff, use your hands to knead it into a smooth ball, working inside the bowl.

If the dough is too sticky, knead in 1 tsp. of flour. Pinch off and drop big blobs of the Chocolate Dough into the lined pan. Press them down to cover the bottom of the pan in a thin layer. Dust pans with flour, if needed.

Chill the pan for about 10 minutes. (Don't leave it for much longer or it will get too stiff to roll.) Wash your hands. While the Chocolate Dough chills, finish making the Mint Dough.

Stir the peppermint extract and another 7 drops of green food colouring into the butter mixture in the second bowl for a bright colour. Mix well.

Gradually stir in 1¼ cups flour. When the dough gets too stiff, use your hands to knead it into a smooth ball, working inside the bowl.

The dough might seem crumbly at first, but keep squeezing and it will soften. After chilling the chocolate dough, drop blobs of mint dough on top and press to cover the chocolate dough.

Dust hands with flour, if needed. Use the plastic to lift the square of dough out of the pan and onto your work table. Keep the plastic under the dough.

To make it easy to roll, use the heels of your hands to flatten one side of the dough to ¼ in. thick. (Flatten 2 inches into the slab.) Place this flattened strip in front of you to begin rolling. Lift the plastic to help you roll the dough into a tight cylinder.

Pat the ends in. Wrap the dough in the plastic. If the cylinder is fatter in some parts than others, roll the fatter parts a few times to even it out.

You should have a cylinder that is 2½ inches in diameter. Chill 30 minutes.

Preheat oven to 350. After chilling, remove the plastic, then use a dinner knife to cut the cylinder into 1-in. thick rounds. Or a grown-up can cut it with a sharp knife.

If the dough is too stiff to cut, let it warm up a little first. Place the rounds on the lined baking sheet at least 3 in. apart. Insert wooden sticks into the rounds so they look like lollipops. Pat the rounds back into circles if they get squished.

Bake the cookies about 16 minutes, or until the edges are firm, the tops are no longer shiny and the green dough is still green. (If baked too long, the green dough will turn golden.)

They might be slightly soft in the middle, but will firm up once cooled. Cool completely on the sheet. Makes about 20 Chocolate-Mint Pinwheel Lollies.

TUNA FISH PATTIES

Supplies: baking sheet, parchment paper, measuring cups and spoons, heavy plastic bag, rolling pin or coffee mug, bowls, fork or pastry blender

Ingredients:

1½ cups cornflake cereal
1 tsp. vegetable oil
6-oz. can of solid white tuna about 10 saltine-type crackers (for ½ cup crumbs)
2 large egg whites
3 tbsp. mayonnaise
1 tsp. Worcestershire sauce
1 tsp. onion salt
¼ tsp. dried dill
¼ tsp. dried oregano
pinch of pepper

Preheat oven to 350. Line a baking sheet with parchment paper.

Seal the cornflakes in a heavy plastic bag. Crush them with a rolling pin or coffee mug to the size of rolled oats. Pour into a bowl. Drizzle in the vegetable oil and stir with a fork to coat. Set aside. Get help opening and draining the can of tuna. Put the tuna into a bowl and mash into small flakes with a fork or pastry blender.

Put the crackers in a plastic bag and crush the same way as the cornflakes. Add ½ cup cracker crumbs to the bowl of tuna. Except for the cornflakes, add the rest of the ingredients and mix well with a fork.

Shape the tuna into four 1-in. thick patties. Roll the patties in the cornflake crumbs to coat all sides. Place on the lined baking sheet. Bake about 25 minutes, until the cornflake crumbs are lightly browned. Makes 4 tuna fish patties.

Chanukah Food Ideas

Home-made sufganiyot for Chanukah will spoil you

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

I must admit that I had never heard of eating sufganiyot on Chanukah. In fact, until I made aliyah 17 years ago, I had never heard of sufganiyot at all. When I was a child, my grandmother made hazelbluzen, a little fried bow-tie-shaped sweet, for Chanukah. As an adult, we often had American-style doughnuts.

New Orleans is famous for its French beignets. The first Chanukah I was in Israel, I was amazed to see almost every food shop selling what I thought were French beignets, but I found out that they are called sufganiyot in Israel. The French don't fill them however.

Granted, it's much easier to simply buy a box of sufganiyot or doughnuts for Chanukah but what a difference between the very best of the store-bought and the home-made. Beware, however. If you do make these fried delicacies this Chanukah, you'll never be satisfied with store-bought ones again.

HAZELBLUZEN

2 eggs
pinch salt
1 1/8 cups flour
1/2 cup powdered sugar (icing sugar)
1 tbsp. cinnamon
vegetable oil for deep frying

Mix first three ingredients and knead until soft and elastic. Roll out on a floured board to a thin sheet. Cut into 2-inch squares with a pastry cutter. Make a slit through the centre of each square and pull one corner through the slit. Drop into deep hot oil and fry until a delicate brown, turning if necessary. They fry quickly and must be watched so that they do not become too brown. They will puff up into all sorts of odd shapes while frying. Drain on absorbent paper and while hot, dust with powdered sugar and cinnamon. As a variety, these can be made in the shape of a rosette or a pinwheel. Makes about 18.

SUFGANIYOT

2 packages yeast
1/3 cup sugar
3/4 cup water
1/4 cup orange juice
1/3 cup margarine
1/2 tsp. salt
4 or 5 cups. flour
3 egg yolks

Mix water, sugar, juice and yeast. Let stand 10 minutes. Melt margarine and add to yeast mix. Beat in eggs and salt. Add flour, mixing by hand to form a soft dough. Let rise 1 1/2 hours.

Note: To test if dough is ready for rolling, place a small piece in a glass of water – if the dough floats to the top, it is ready.

Roll dough 1/4-inch thick and cut into circles (approximately 2 inches in diameter). Let circles rise 1/2 hour. Heat oil in a deep frying pan or pot until small bubbles rise to the surface. You can test the oil by dropping a small piece of bread into it. If it sizzles and bubbles, the oil is ready. Deep fry about 3 minutes, turning once.

Remove with a slotted spoon and drain on several layers of paper towel with newspaper underneath. Sprinkle with confectioner's sugar.

When sufganiyot are cool, inject with jelly. You can use syringes like those used for administering medicine to young children, but better ones are available at cooking supply stores. Makes 18-24.

CHOCOLATE SUFGANIYOT

1/4 cup oil plus oil for frying
3 cups sugar, divided
2 eggs plus 1 egg yolk
3 1/2 cups flour
1/4 cup cocoa
1 tbsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
1 cup buttermilk

Note: To make these pareve, you can substitute pareve creamer or soy milk to which 1 tbsp. of lemon juice or vinegar has been added or substitute orange juice.

Combine 1/4 cup oil, 1 cup sugar, eggs and egg yolk in bowl and beat with electric mixer until fluffy.

Sift together flour, cocoa, baking powder and salt. Stir into oil mixture alternately with buttermilk.

Heat 2 to 3 in. oil in heavy deep skillet to 340. Drop batter by tablespoons into hot oil and cook in batches until doughnuts are evenly fried, 2 or 3 minutes per side. Do not crowd pan.

Drain on paper towels. Roll in remaining 2 cups sugar. Makes 24.

SUFGANIYOT 2

If you feel that preparing sufganiyot from scratch is too time-consuming try these doughnuts that are made from frozen challah or roll dough. You'll be glad you did.

1 25-oz. package frozen challah or roll dough
1 8-oz. jar raspberry or strawberry preserves
1 48-oz. bottle vegetable oil
2 tbsp. powdered sugar

Thaw dough according to package directions. If using roll dough, pat each roll into a 4-inch circle. If using challah dough, roll out to 1/4 inch and cut into 4-inch circles. Place half of roll circles on lightly greased baking sheets, spoon 1/2 tsp. preserves in centre of each circle. Brush edges of each jelly-topped roll circle with water. Top with remaining roll circles and pinch edges to seal. Cover and let rise in a warm place, free from drafts, 30 minutes or until doubled in bulk.

Pour oil to a depth of 2 to 3 in. into a Dutch oven and heat to 375. Fry 2 or 3 doughnuts at a time 1 to 1 1/2 minutes on each side or until golden brown. Drain well on paper towels. Sprinkle doughnuts with powdered sugar, and serve immediately. Makes about 12.

SUFGANIYOT FILLINGS

An alternative way to fill sufganiyot is to roll out the dough to a thickness of 1/8 in. Cut out the dough into 24 rounds with a juice glass or any object about 2 inches in diameter. Take 1/2 tsp. of preserves and place in centre of 12 rounds. Top with the other 12. Press down at edges, sealing with egg whites. Crimping with the thumb and second finger is best. Let rise for about 30 minutes.

For all fillings, mix ingredients together and fill sufganiyot.

Sweet Filling
1 cup drained cottage or farmers' cheese
1 egg
2 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. vanilla

Savory Filling
1 cup drained cottage or farmers' cheese
1 egg
2 tbsp. salt
pepper
dash oregano and parsley flakes

Nut Filling
1 cup chopped walnuts, pecans or pistachios
2 to 3 tbsp. sugar
1/2 tsp. rose water
1/2 tsp. orange-blossom water

Variation: Use 1/2 tsp. ground cinnamon; substitute 2 tsp. water for rose and orange-blossom water.

Guests will appreciate these tasty finger foods

BY EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

With Chanukah just around the corner, and family and friends stopping by to help celebrate, it's nice to have tasty hors d'oeuvres or canapés to serve before the latkes and sufganiyot are ready.

Decide ahead of time whether you will be passing trays of appetizers around, or whether you will keep them all on a table. If passing them, be sure to choose trays that aren't too large and heavy. And avoid serving only fussy intricate little appetizers – throw in some dips, spreads or patés.

BASIL TOMATO TART

1/2 of a 15-oz. unbaked pie crust
1 1/2 cups shredded mozzarella cheese
5 roma tomatoes or 4 medium tomatoes
1 cup loosely packed fresh basil leaves
4 cloves garlic
1/2 cup mayonnaise or salad dressing
1/4 cup grated parmesan cheese
1/8 tsp. ground white pepper
fresh basil leaves (optional)

Line crust with double thickness of foil. Bake at 450 for 8 minutes. Remove foil. Bake 4 to 5 minutes more or until set and dry. Remove from oven. Reduce temperature to 375.

Sprinkle crust with 1/2 cup of the mozzarella cheese. Cool slightly on a wire rack. Cut tomatoes into wedges; drain on paper towels. Arrange tomato wedges atop cheese in the pie shell. In a food processor bowl, combine basil and garlic and process until coarsely chopped. Sprinkle over tomatoes.

In a medium mixing bowl, combine remaining mozzarella cheese, mayonnaise, parmesan cheese and pepper. Spoon cheese mixture over basil mixture, spreading to evenly cover the top. Bake at 375 for 35 to 40 minutes or until top is golden and bubbly. Serve warm. If desired, garnish with basil leaves. Serves 6 to 8.

ARTICHOKE BRUSCHETTA

1 6-oz. jar marinated artichoke hearts, drained, patted dry, chopped
1/2 cup grated parmesan cheese
1/3 cup finely chopped red onion
1/4 cup water chestnuts, chopped
1 tsp. parsley, dried
5 to 6 tbsp. mayonnaise
16 1/3-in.-thick French bread baguette rounds

Place the artichoke hearts, cheese, water chestnuts, parsley and red onions in a bowl. Mix in enough mayonnaise to form thick spread. Preheat broiler. Top bread rounds with spread. Arrange bruschetta on baking sheet. Broil until spread is heated through and begins to brown, about 2 minutes. Makes 16 pieces.

BASIL MOZZARELLA & TOMATO PIZZA FOR ONE, TWO OR THREE

1/2 8-oz. package Italian bread shells (one 4-oz. bread shell, about 6 inches in diameter, or you can use small flour tortillas)
1 plum tomato, very thinly sliced
1/2 cup shredded mozzarella cheese
2 tbsp. chopped fresh basil
2 tbsp. sliced pitted ripe olives
1/8 tsp. cracked black pepper

Preheat oven to 450. Place one 4-ounce Italian bread shell on an ungreased cookie sheet. Arrange plum tomato slices over bread. Sprinkle with shredded mozzarella cheese. Top with chopped fresh basil, sliced olives, and black pepper. Bake 10 minutes or until cheese is melted. This can be doubled or tripled and each individual pizza can be cut into quarters and served as bite size pieces.

CHICKEN AND BEEF SATÉ

1 lb. chicken breast cutlets
1 steak, 1 inch thick (about 1 1/4 lb.)
2 large limes
1 tbsp. grated, peeled ginger root
2 tsp. sugar
24 (10-in.) wooden skewers
1/4 cup soy sauce
2 garlic cloves, crushed with garlic press
cucumber relish (below)
spicy peanut sauce (below)

Slice chicken cutlets lengthwise into 3/4-in.-wide strips; place in medium bowl. Holding knife almost parallel to work surface, slice steak crosswise into thin strips; place in another bowl.

From limes, grate 2 tsp. peel and squeeze 2 tbsp. juice. In small bowl, mix lime peel, lime juice, soy sauce, ginger, sugar and garlic with fork.

Stir half of soy-sauce mixture into chicken. Stir remaining soy-sauce mixture into beef. Cover and refrigerate both bowls 30 minutes to marinate. Soak wooden skewers in water 20 minutes.

Meanwhile, prepare spicy peanut sauce and cucumber relish. Thread chicken strips and beef strips separately on wooden skewers, accordion-style. Using a grill pan or an outdoor grill, grill the chicken and beef strips over medium heat 3 to 7 minutes, turning once, until just cooked through (you can also broil the meat). Serve immediately with spicy peanut sauce and cucumber relish.

Spicy Peanut Sauce:

In medium bowl, with wire whisk or fork, mix 1/4 cup creamy peanut butter, 1/4 cup very hot tap water, 4 teaspoons seasoned rice vinegar, 1 tablespoon soy sauce, 1 tablespoon light molasses, and 1/8 teaspoon crushed red pepper until smooth. Makes about 1/2 cup.

Cucumber Relish: In medium bowl, with spoon, mix 4 medium Kirby cucumbers (about 4 ounces each), diced, 1/4 cup seasoned rice vinegar, 2 tablespoons diced red onion, 1 tablespoon vegetable oil, and 1/4 teaspoon crushed red pepper. Makes about 2 1/2 cups.

ASIAN STUFFED MUSHROOMS

1 pound mushrooms, large
2 tablespoons oil
3 large garlic cloves, peeled and minced
2 tablespoons fresh ginger, peeled and minced
3/4 cup red bell pepper, finely chopped (1 medium pepper)
1 stalk bok choy, chopped (1/2 cup) (you can substitute celery)
1 teaspoon sesame oil
1 tablespoon soy sauce
1/2 teaspoon salt
1/2 cup fresh bread crumbs
1/4 teaspoon chili paste
3 scallions, thinly sliced
1 tablespoon fresh lemon juice

Preheat the oven to 375. Grease a baking pan. Pull the stems from the mushroom caps and chop them finely. Place the caps in the prepared baking pan. Heat the oil in a skillet over medium heat. Sauté the garlic, ginger and red bell pepper just until tender, about 3 minutes. (Stir in a tablespoon or two of water if the ginger begins to stick.) Stir in the chopped mushroom stems and the bok choy. Cook until the mushrooms are tender and the liquid has evaporated (about 5 minutes more). Remove pan from the heat, and stir in the sesame oil, soy sauce, salt, bread crumbs, chili paste, scallions, and lemon juice. Using a teaspoon, stuff the mushroom caps with the filling. Bake for 20 to 25 minutes, until caps are tender. Serve immediately. Serves 6. This can be doubled or tripled.

THAI EGGPLANT DIP

A tasty baked eggplant appetizer, served with baked pita bread wedges.

1 eggplant
1/3 cup golden raisins, chopped
2 tbsp.water
2 tbsp. chopped fresh basil
2 tsp. fresh lemon juice
1 tsp. olive oil
1/4 tsp. black pepper
1/8 tsp. salt
1 garlic clove, minced
4 pitas
1/2 cup shredded part-skim mozzarella cheese (optional)
3 tbsp. grated parmesan cheese

Preheat oven to 425. Pierce eggplant several times with a fork, and wrap in foil. Place eggplant on a baking sheet, and bake at 425 for 1 hour. Cool slightly. Peel, seed and mash eggplant with a potato masher.

Combine raisins and water in a small bowl. Cover with plastic wrap and microwave at high 30 seconds. Let stand, covered, 10 minutes, then drain.

Add the raisins, basil, lemon juice, olive oil, pepper, salt and garlic to eggplant. Mix well and then preheat the broiler. If you are using cheese, sprinkle the pitas with cheeses and broil for 2 minutes or until cheese melts.

If you are not using cheese, toast the pitas under the broiler for 1 minute. Cut each pita into 6 wedges, and serve with a spoonful of eggplant dip on top. Serves 6 to 8. This can be doubled or tripled.

Surreal Gourmet's new cookbook features bite-sized foods

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Bob Blumer, creator and host of The Surreal Gourmet on Food Network Canada recently celebrated the start of his fourth season with the launch of his fourth cookbook – Surreal Gourmet Bites: Show Stoppers and Conversation Starters from Whitecap Books Canada.

The Surreal Gourmet is aired in 20 countries, including the Food Network in the United States.

"In every episode of my show I take my "Toastermobile," which is an Airstream trailer with a full kitchen built inside it, and I go on location and cook for a group of people, for example – construction workers.

"One will become my sous-chef and we will make food that is themed to construction workers or whoever. We serve it and have a big dinner party – every episode is a drive-by dinner party!" states the Montreal native who hangs his hat in Los Angeles – just below the Hollywood sign – when he isn't taping his TV show in Toronto or long-distance cycling through exotic locales such as New Zealand and Thailand, just for the fun of it.

On occasional episodes of his show, Blumer invites celebrities to join him in the Toastermobile. This season, viewers will be treated to a show featuring all four of the finalists – Troy, Nick, Amy and winner Kwami – from last season's The Apprentice, with Donald Trump, on NBC. If this competitive foursome can't take the heat… then they better stay out of the Toastermobile's kitchen.

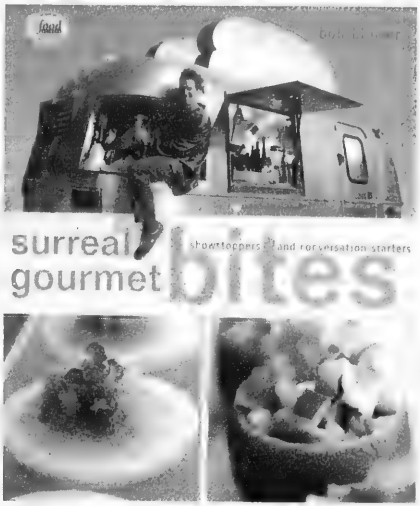
Fans of The Surreal Gourmet know that there is great camaraderie between the chef and his celebrated guests, probably due, in part, to Blumer's origins in the entertainment world. He has worked in a variety of capacities in the music business, including as manager to singer Jane Siberry for 12 years.

"Around year seven of managing Jane, she was making a record in England, which took a year, so I had time on my hands. I liked to cook at the time, I was a good cook by my friends' standards, but I certainly wasn't a real chef – but for some reason I decided I wanted to write a cookbook and I just did it.

"The book was filled with my entire bachelor repertoire recipes – there was nothing surreal about it, but I illustrated it myself and the illustrations were surreal and that is how I ended up calling myself the Surreal Gourmet," states the chef and artist.

He describes his latest book, Surreal Gourmet Bites, as "a flight of bites" – a whole collection of bite-sized foods that can be used as appetizers or could make up an entire dinner menu.

"My mission is to make food that people can actually duplicate. My whole objective is to help people become culinary heroes in their own kitchen, so I'm trying to make other people look good, and the way I can make them look good is by making it easier for them," adds Blumer.



In the book, Blumer includes a recipe in tribute to his Jewish roots that he calls Vodka & Latkes: They're Not Just For Chanukah Anymore. "Sometimes food for the Jewish holidays is traditional and can get a little boring, so this is my way of taking something that is traditional and having people look at it in a totally different light," says Blumer, who prides himself on being the mensch his mother raised him to be.

VODKA & LATKES

2 medium russet potatoes, peeled and grated
1 egg beaten
1 tbsp. matzah meal
1 tbsp. minced onion
½ tsp. salt
¼ canola oil for frying
1 bunch fresh dill
¼ cup sour cream
3 oz. smoked salmon
1½ cups lemon vodka, chilled in the freezer

Squeeze excess water out of potatoes. In a large bowl, toss potatoes with egg, matzah meal, onion and salt.

In a large sauté pan over medium-high heat, add oil. When oil is hot, drop 12 1-tsp. dollops of potatoes into oil and flatten gently with a fork. Fry for 2 minutes, or until the bottom side is golden brown and crispy. Flip and cook for 2 more minutes, or until the second side is crispy.

Drain on a paper towel. Repeat the first part of the process with 12 more dollops. This time, after the bottoms are crispy, but before flipping the latkes, place a dill top on the uncooked top side of each latke. Using your finger, gently press dill into the potatoes. Flip latkes, then use a fork to press the latke down against the surface of the pan. Cook until the bottom side is crispy.

To assemble, line up the first batch of latkes. Top with a tsp. of sour cream and a couple of layers of salmon. Cover with a dill-encrusted latke and serve with a shot of vodka. L'Chaim!

A glimpse into the world of Israeli wine

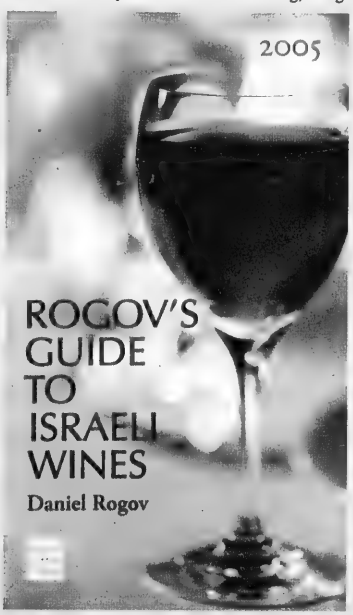
By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The reputation of kosher wine has come a long way since the days when most people thought being kosher meant being red and ultra-sweet.

It still might come as a surprise to some, however, that in the past 20 years – although people were cultivating grapes and making wines as early as 5,000 years ago – wine producers in Israel have raised their standards to the highest levels.

With more than 120 wineries now producing thousands of wines annually, Israel has made its way onto the world wine scene.

Whereas 25 years ago, more than 80 per cent of the wines produced in the country were sweet, today nearly 80 per cent are dry whites and reds.



In order to offer consumers a glimpse into the world of Israeli wine, Toby Press has launched an annual guide written by Israeli wine critic Daniel Rogov, author of weekly wine and restaurant columns in the daily newspaper Ha'aretz.

The more than 250-page hard-covered guide includes information on Israeli wineries and their products, reviews of more than 1,000 wines, an introduction to the history of Israeli wine and wine regions, and a glossary of wine terminology.

Israel is an ideal country for manufacturing wine, Rogov tells us, because it lies in the right area – 30 degrees north or south of the equator – for cultivation of wine grapes, which can thrive in many different types of soil and in climates that receive little rainfall.

The country is divided into five vine-growing regions: Galilee, Shomron, Shimshon, Jerusalem Mountains and the Negev, and grows both white and red wine grapes.

The wines of every large winery and the majority of medium-sized wineries in Israel are kosher, but those of smaller wineries are often not.

In order for an Israeli wine to be certified as kosher, several requirements must be met, but Rogov stresses that none of these requirements has a negative impact on the quality of the wine.

Actually, he says, some requirements are widely acknowledged to be sound agricultural practices even by producers of non-kosher wines.

A highlight of the book for some readers will certainly be Rogov's description of his wine-tasting.

The peak time for tastings, he says, is in the morning, "long after the first coffee, but before one has developed a true hunger.

"The room in which I do my tasting is well lit and as odour-free as possible. The only things on the table are my notepad, sugar-free and salt-free bread, a large sheet of blank white paper, and a bucket for spitting."

Many critics instruct their assistants to serve the same wine at least twice during a tasting, he says, in order to "check on one's state of mind," for if, during the course of the tasting, the same score or a score of plus or minus one point is awarded, it shows that one was truly focused on the task at hand.

"On the other hand, scores of the same wine that differ by two or more points indicate that either one's palate or one's sense of concentration was not well enough honed that morning."

Those who want to hold their own wine-tasting parties need not follow professional rules, but a few basic guidelines include tasting white wines before red, and within the same group, start with light wines before full-bodied wines.

While professionals can sample 50 or more wines at a single sitting, the maximum number that should be tasted at a friendly gathering is eight, says Rogov.

Rogov's Guide to Israeli Wines would make a good Chanukah gift for wine-lovers, or those interested in Israeli wine.

CANDLE NUMBER SIX

"Welcome to this year's Chanukah performance."

The auditorium, packed with eager parents and grandparents, fell silent as Mrs. Tehrani began speaking. "Chanukah is the holiday celebrating the Jews' victory over the Syrian Greeks in ancient Israel, the reconquest of the Temple in Jerusalem, and the subsequent miracle of the tiny flask of oil burning for eight whole days. To commemorate this miracle, we..."

Sitting near the stage with the rest of her class, Rebecca found it hard to listen to Mrs. Tehrani. Nervously, she practised her line over and over in her head. "I am candle number 6, some menorahs use oil and wicks. I am candle number 6, some menorahs use oil and wicks." Soon, she was going to have to stand up in front of the whole room, light the sixth candle in the large menorah, and say her line.

"I am candle number 6, some menorahs use oil and wicks. I am candle number 6, some menorahs use oil and wicks." she repeated to herself, desperately hoping she wouldn't forget her line.

"First, the kindergarten will do the dreidel dance," Mrs. Tehrani concluded, walking to the side of the stage and smiling as the kindergarteners clambered up the stairs and formed a circle, holding hands.

"OK, one, two, three," counted their teacher, and the music started playing. Some of the children started singing too early. Some of them started singing too late. Around and around they spun, heartily screaming. "I have a little dreidel." Two of them almost fell off the stage, but Mrs. Tehrani caught them.

"I am candle number six, some menorahs use oil and wicks."

"That was so beautiful." Mrs. Tehrani was addressing the audience again. "Next, the first grade will light the school menorah and recite Chanukah poetry written by Esther Pam, fifth grade."

Rebecca's stomach tensed. It was almost her turn. "I am candle number six, some menorahs use oil and wicks."

Now Ben was lighting the first candle. "I am candle number one," he proudly declared. "Lighting the menorah is so much fun."

Everybody applauded. Now it was Elliana's turn.

Oblivious to everything around her, Rebecca just kept chanting to herself, "I am candle number 6, some menorahs use oil and wicks."

Then Caleb. Then Lea. Then Avi. "I am candle number 5. Some candles come from a beehive."

Now it was Rebecca's turn. It's going to be OK, she told herself. It's easy. You can do it. Slowly, she stood up, and walked to the menorah. There was a stool there, in case anybody couldn't reach. Rebecca climbed onto the stool, facing the menorah...and the crowd. Through the five dancing lights in the menorah, she could see her parents and older sister, waiting expectantly. Her teacher, Morah Liat, gave her the shamash, the lit candle she would light the menorah with. Carefully, she stretched out her hand and touched the shamash, to candle number 6. But instead of lighting, the wick sputtered, and the candle in her hand went out, emitting a thin wisp of smoke. The whole room was staring at her. "Oh," she moaned, not knowing what to do.

Morah Liat took a fireplace lighter and relit Rebecca's shamash.

Rebecca tried to light her candle again. This time, the flame caught, and candle number 6 blazed up. Rebecca was already hopping off the stool to return to her seat when Mrs. Tehrani whispered, "Your line!"

My line! She jumped back onto the stool, again facing the waiting crowd, desperately trying to remember her line. She couldn't. How did it start?

"I am candle..." prompted Morah Liat.

Right! "I am candle number 6..." But she couldn't remember the rest. Wide eyed, she sent Morah Liat another pleading glance.

"Most menorahs..." mouthed her teacher.

"Most menorahs use oil and wicks!" burst out Rebecca so fast that she knew nobody in the audience heard what she said. But that didn't stop them from cheering louder than they had for anyone else. Rebecca ran to her seat, her cheeks aflame. They were only clapping for her so she wouldn't feel bad.

Tami lit candle number 7, but Rebecca didn't notice. All she could think about was how she had totally messed up in front of everybody.

* * * * * *

"I would like to thank all the children for their beautiful presentations. Thank you, parents and grandparents, for joining us here today. We will be serving soufganiyot, jelly donuts, now. Happy Chanukah."

Everyone leapt up and joined the jelly donut frenzy. Well, almost everyone. Rebecca remained drooped in her chair, ruminating. She felt a hand on her shoulder. It was Mrs. Kahn, the third-grade teacher.

"Rebecca, I want to tell you a story. When I was in second grade, I was in a Chanukah performance like this one. They sprinkled cotton balls all over the stage to look like snow, and when I went to light the menorah, I slipped on the cotton and knocked over the menorah. It went crashing down in a spray of glass and oil, and the cotton balls burst into flame. I was so scared I jumped off the stage. People were running everywhere and screaming, 'Pour water on it!' 'No, don't, it's an oil fire!' Someone grabbed a fire extinguisher and put it out, but there was so much smoke already that the automatic sprinklers went off — everyone got soaked, and the fire department came...You're laughing. I was crying. The performance was ruined. But you know what?"

"What?" asked Rebecca, who was unsuccessfully trying to suppress her laughter.

"Now I look back at it and I laugh too, even though it seemed so horrible at the time... Come, let's go get some soufganiyot before they're all gone."

Rebecca stood up, smiled and raced Mrs. Kahn to the donut table.

Abbas gains in Palestinian leadership race

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — With a patient Realpolitik, as well as the tacit approval of Israel and the United States, Mahmoud Abbas is inching toward the Palestinian leadership.

A poll of West Bank and Gaza Strip residents released Sunday found that 41 per cent of Palestinians support Abbas' bid to succeed the late Yasser Arafat as Palestinian Authority president – a coup considering the dour 69-year-old PLO veteran's single-digit showing in the polls until recently.

The presidential election is scheduled for Jan. 9.

Abbas' popularity increased partly by default, after firebrand Fatah leader Marwan Barghouti, serving five life sentences in an Israeli jail for murder, dropped his own potential run for the top office last Friday. Political analysts attributed Barghouti's decision to fears within Fatah that, if the faction was split by infighting, Hamas would take over the Palestinian street.

> 'When they would like to meet, we will meet'

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has had to perform a balancing act of his own. On the one hand, Sharon confidants say, he wants Abbas to win. Yet if he backs Abbas too openly, Sharon runs the risk of creating the image in the eyes of Palestinians that Abbas is a puppet.

So Sharon made do, in an interview with Newsweek published Sunday, with vague encouragement.

We "will take all the necessary steps to enable them to conduct their elections with as little interference as possible by opening the roads and taking our forces out of their towns," Sharon said.

Asked whether he was ready to meet with Abbas, Sharon replied, "When they would like to meet, we will meet."

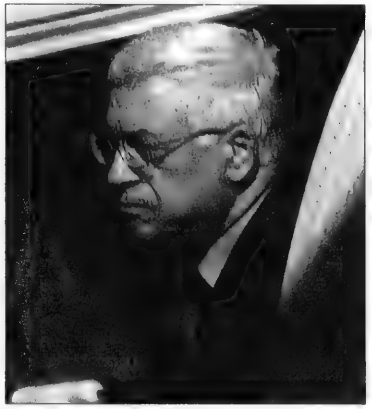
But more remarkable for its absence was Sharon's traditional insistence on a complete cessation of Palestinian terrorist and guerrilla attacks before peace talks can resume. Instead, he chose to urge the Palestinian Authority to stop anti-Israel incitement in its official media and in its schools.

This promised to be a relatively easy task for Abbas, who, as Palestinian Authority prime minister, tried to stop such incitement until he resigned in frustration at the lack of progress on the "road map" to peace.

But, as if spurred by Sharon's rhetorical restraint, Abbas is now talking about a ceasefire – not through a crackdown within the West Bank and Gaza, but by consensus within the various Palestinian groups.

"Our goal is to cool down the whole situation, to stop all kinds of violence and terror. We will ask the Israelis to stop their assassinations and house demolitions," Abbas said in a parallel Newsweek interview.

Abbas even took a personal risk by seeking to assuage Israeli concern over his affirmation, during a recent Palestinian parliamentary session, of the demand for a "right of return" to land now in Israel for Arab refugees from the 1948 war.



Mahmoud Abbas

Asked if this demand was irrevocable, Abbas told the magazine, "I didn't say that.

"I'm not talking about anything beyond the road map," he added. "According to the road map, there should be a just and agreed-upon solution for the refugees according to" UN Resolution 194, which grants Palestinian refugees who want to return the right to do so and calls for compensation for those who waive this right.

"President [George W.] Bush said there should be a two-state solution. The Palestinian state should be independent, viable and contiguous."

Zionist groups announce initiative to combat anti-Semitism

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

STRASBOURG — Groups of young people will distribute educational material to combat anti-Semitism in French public schools, a convention of European Zionist youth groups decided Sunday in Strasbourg.

The project is slated to begin in January, with teams of Jewish and non-Jewish youth entering classrooms and explaining the importance of fighting anti-Semitism.

Some 250 leaders of Zionist youth groups from 22 European countries attended the conference, held to respond to the steep rise in the number of violent anti-Semitic incidents in Europe, and especially in France in 2004.

Amos Hermon, chair of the Jewish Agency's education committee, said most of the violent incidents have been against Jewish school children in classrooms or on their way to school.

It became clear at the conference that political affiliation influences the strategies proposed to counter anti-Semitism, Hermon said.

"Right-wing groups, such as Beitar and Bnei Akiva, claim aliyah [immigration to Israel] is the only solution. More politically neutral groups, like the Scouts, believe in cultivating inter-religious dialogue with Christians and Muslims," he said.

Hermon and Israeli Minister of Diaspora Affairs Natan Sharansky initiated the conference.

Ukrainian Jews wonder if Yushchenko is good for them

By LILY GALILI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

The 100,000 Jews living in Ukraine lack any real impact on election results in a country with 50 million inhabitants. But like other places in the world, Jewish strength is not measured in numbers only, but in terms of its economic and political power. At present, there are 15 Jewish representatives in the Ukrainian parliament, a number much greater than their proportion in the population, and Jewish tycoons can be found in the political camps of both challenger Viktor Yushchenko and Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovich.

According to sources following the election in Ukraine, most Jews supported the liberal Yushchenko, because of his links to the West, but also out of concern that the re-election of Yanukovich, with his ties to Russia, would force isolation on Ukraine and nudge it closer to the Arab world.

However, Yushchenko's Jewish supporters are not without concerns over the strengthening of the Ukrainian nationalist elements in his party, which they believe could bring about an increase in anti-Semitism in the country.

> 'I am convinced the article was commissioned to blacken the name of Yushchenko and sabotage a source of support for him'

"The present government, with its ties to Russia, is good for the Jews," said one Jewish activist in western Ukraine who asked to remain anonymous. "There were only short periods of independence in Ukraine. Objectively speaking, the struggle here now can be seen in a positive light as the beginning of the flourishing of a civil society. But from the Jewish perspective, I'm not sure it's good. The freedom heralded by Yushchenko's party strengthens nationalist elements around him. So far in western Ukraine [where most of whose residents supported Yushchenko], there have been fewer anti-Semitic incidents than in western Europe. Here and there, swastikas were painted, sometimes tombstones were smashed. The present government is fighting this. So there is fear of change."

This attitude trickled down to an article published last week in the British daily the Guardian, which noted Yushchenko's ambivalent position on closing down an opposition paper after it published a stinging anti-Semitic article. The article in Selskie Vesti (Village News), stated that Jews had joined the German army in invading Ukraine. Senior Ukrainian officials, among them Yanukovich, called for the closing of the paper.

Yushchenko, however, wavered in his response. In the midst of the election campaign, the most widely read opposition paper, which had supported him, was too important to give up easily. Only after initial confusion did Yushchenko criticize the article and join the call to shut down the paper.

"I am convinced the article was commissioned to blacken the name of Yushchenko and sabotage a source of support for him," said Leonid Finberg, director of the Judaica Institute in Kiev and chairman of a publishing house. "Presenting him as a person who supports anti-Semitism is a terrible distortion. His father was in Auschwitz, and it is known that his family saved Jews during the Holocaust. The Ukrainian intelligensia, including the Jews, supports him completely. He had made a great contribution to constructive dialogue between the Jewish and the Ukrainian intelligensia."

Finberg also told of the strong position Yushchenko took at a conference on anti-Semitism in Sweden and about an appearance he made before a group of Ukrainian Jews.

Finberg attached little importance to graffiti calling to strike at Jews and Russians that was painted on the walls of clubs associated with Yushchenko. "There are nationalist and anti-Semitic elements on the fringes of all political personalities here. I have no doubt that Yushchenko and his people are not connected to this. Such graffiti can be found today all over the world, including Israel."

The head of the Ukrainian Jewish community, Yosef Zisles, rejected what he called "absurd rumors" connecting Yushchenko to anti-Semitism.

Britain honours spy who saved thousands from Nazis

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BERLIN — Britain honoured its top spy in Nazi Germany and officially revealed a secret hero who saved 10,000 German Jews from the Holocaust while working undercover as a passport officer in Berlin.

Frank Foley not only bent the rules by giving out visas to Jews trying to flee the mounting persecution under Hitler, he even went to concentration camps to plead for prisoners and sheltered many in his home. As an undercover agent, Foley had no diplomatic immunity, and put his life in danger with his actions.

"In the big history of the Holocaust... there are a number of small stories which serve to mitigate humanity," said British Ambassador to Germany Peter Torry at a plaque-unveiling ceremony last week in Britain's embassy in Berlin.

"At considerable risk to himself, this unassuming man chose to follow his conscience," he added. Yad Vashem designated him a "Righteous Among the Nations" in 1999.

"I never met [Foley]," said 91-year-old former refugee Elisheva Lernau, "but his name was written on my heart."

Lernau fled Germany for Palestine in 1935 with papers provided by Foley and just 10 German reichmarks in her purse.

During the 1930s, Jews hoping to flee to Mandatory Palestine needed a British visa – only officially available to highly qualified Jews or those who could deposit a large sum in a Palestine bank.

"This guy is a shining light who has been kept on the sidelines... the honour he has received should have happened during his lifetime," said Peter Weiss, whose mother was sheltered by the British spy.

Foley's work first came to light in a book by spywriter Michael Smith, who was tipped off by British intelligence.

"They told me about this man who saved more Jews than Schindler," said Smith, referring to Oskar Schindler, the German industrialist who saved some 1,100 Jews. He was made famous by Stephen Spielberg's 1993 film Schindler's List.

"Schindler's character is what makes him interesting to people... he was German... he was using the Jews, and then he found a place in his heart for them," Smith added. "Foley was just a good guy doing what he could."

The British spy left Germany a day before the outbreak of World War II and continued to work for the British Secret Service. He died in England in 1958, his role a close secret. However, those he saved in Israel campaigned to keep his memory alive.

France lets Hezbollah TV station stay on air

By PHILIP CARMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — A year of intense pressure from Jewish organizations has come to naught after France's public broadcasting authority said it would allow Hezbollah's television station to continue transmitting.

In a move that was strongly criticized by Jewish groups, the CSA public broadcasting authority rejected an interior ministry recommendation that Al-Manar's transmissions be "immediately terminated," and issued Al-Manar a new licence on Nov. 19.

Because the station is broadcast across Europe on the French-owned Eutelstat satellite network, the decision effectively allows Al-Manar to continue transmitting throughout the 25-state European Union.

Jewish groups began protesting the channel following the transmission of the virulently anti-Semitic Syrian-made series Al-Shatat, or Diaspora, during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan in October 2003.

Received assurances the channel would cease broadcasting hate material

Based on the notorious czarist-era forgery The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, the series depicted Jews planning world domination and presented violent scenes in which a Christian child is murdered on a rabbi's orders so his blood can be used to make matzot.

Jewish leaders showed the film to a top-level cabinet committee late last year, evoking a strong reaction from Prime Minister Jean-Pierre Raffarin.

Addressing the annual dinner of the CRIF umbrella organization of French Jews in January, Raffarin promised to bring new legislation enabling the CSA to revoke the licences of channels that could prove a danger to public order, describing the Syrian series as "unbearable to the eye, scorching to the heart and revolting to reason."

The legislation has already been effective in one instance, when the CSA refused to licence a Kurdish channel linked to the PKK terrorist group.

However, the CSA said last week that it had received assurances from Al-Manar that the channel would cease broadcasting hate material, and therefore could be licenced.

Jewish groups immediately denounced the decision, with CRIF saying it was "scandalized."

In a letter to CSA Chairman Dominique Baudis, CRIF President Roger Cukierman accused the broadcasting authority of bowing to pressure from Arab states.

"There is such incoherence in this decision that it appears to me that it can only be explained by CSA submission to pressure from countries which sponsor Hezbollah: Lebanon which hosts it, Syria, the occupying power, and Iran, which finances and arms Hezbollah," Cukierman wrote.

American Jewish organizations also joined in the fray.

In a letter to French President Jacques Chirac, the Anti-Defamation League's national director, Abraham Foxman, said the decision "undermines the significant progress that the government of France made last year to combat the anti-Jewish and anti-Israel environment that exists in some sectors of French society."

Jason Isaacson, the American Jewish Committee's director of government and international affairs, protested the decision in a private meeting in Paris with government spokesperson Jean-Francois Cope.

"Al-Manar is a fountain of hatred against Jews, Israel, America and other Western societies spilling over the airwaves, and it should not be allowed to use France as a vehicle for spreading its message of hate across Europe," Isaacson said, according to an AJCommittee statement issued after the meeting.

The widespread criticism of the decision apparently has failed to moderate Al-Manar, which remained as verbose as ever.

Reacting to the new agreement with the CSA, a spokesperson for Al-Manar said it now had "regularized relations between the two parties and caused the failure of efforts by Israel and the Zionist lobby to stop the transmission of this Arab channel in France and throughout Europe."

But CSA chairman Baudis warned that the new licensing agreement was not a blank cheque.

Referring to offensive material broadcast in the past by Al-Manar, Baudis said the channels's "signature of this license implies, therefore, that you will formally renounce the broadcast of programs of this nature on the satellite, which comes under French law."

Whether that actually happens remains to be seen.

At peak viewing time last Tuesday evening, the channel broadcast its weekly game show, The Mission, with the winner given the honor of symbolically entering Jerusalem to liberate it from the Zionists.
